VIENNA MONUMENT:
Austria's first monument to Jews killed by the Nazis was unveiled in Vienna on October 25, 2000, as a testimony to the almost complete eradication of the country's Jewish community in the second world war. The "Nameless Library," the brainchild of veteran Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal and constructed by British artist Rachel Whiteread, was opened almost four years later than planned because of a row over the site in the heart of the Austrian capital.

Film examines tragic Munich Olympics

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the world of elite athletics, the Olympic credo of peaceful, friendly competition has a special pride of place.

Not only do the Olympics bring together superb athletes who match themselves against the world's best, but the games claim to embody higher, nobler ideals untarnished by the imperfect world of politics and self-interest.

That's the theory, but reality has had a nasty habit of intruding on that idealistic world. A brief reading of history shows the Olympics have never been divorced from politics. In 1936, Nazi Germany turned the games into a propaganda showcase for its racist state; in 1980, the West boycotted the Moscow Games over the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan; in 1984, the East Bloc returned the favour and refused to participate in the Los Angeles Games.

Throw in numerous examples of Olympic-affiliated bodies ostracizing Israel from regional sports organizations thanks to the political clout of Arab countries, and a picture emerges of the Olympics and politics as intertwined as two Greco-Roman wrestlers in a gold-medal match.

Never was that as clear as at the1972 Olympic Games in Munich,West Germany. For those who have forgotten or never knew the story, a recently released documentary shines a light on a terrorist attack that shocked the world.

One Day in September, directed by Kevin Macdonald and distributed by Blackwatch Releasing, reminds us that sport is never divorced from the world around it. Intended by the Germans to showcase a kinder, gentler image to the world, the Munich Olympics were turned on their head by the dramatic kidnapping of Israeli sportsmen by Palestinian Black September terrorists linked to Yasser Arafat.

The events of the day, culminating in a police shootout at an airport in which all the Israelis and most of the Palestinians were killed, is recounted in a dramatic documentary that packs the punch of a Tom Clancy thriller. Fear, hubris, human folly, regret and tragedy all have a place in the film, which melds the political and human aspects of the events into a riveting whole. Particularly moving are the recollections of Ankie Spitzer, widow of Israeli fencing coach Andre Spitzer.

The games were 10 days old and full of wonderful sports stories – Olga Korbut's gymnastics feats, Mark Spitz's seven gold medals – before the terrorists struck.

Early in the morning of Sept. 5 they broke into the quarters housing Israeli athletes and coaches, killing two and holding nine others hostage. One miraculously escaped. Negotiations ensued the rest of the day as the unprepared Germans played for time and sought a solution to their embarrassing situation.

In a film full of disturbing images – the bodies of slain athletes are graphically shown – one of the most jarring is that filmed at midday. With two Israelis already dead and nine others held captive, with the world's media focusing on the tense standoff, we witness dozens of athletes enjoying themselves in a recreation area only a few hundred metres from the Israeli quarters. They play ping-pong, sun themselves and discuss their competition, seemingly oblivious to the drama unfolding nearby.

Following the massacre of the Israeli athletes, the heartless disregard for the Israelis continued. The Games resumed the very same day, barely skipping a beat.

Although the film does not explore the apparently self-centred and callous attitude of the athletes and Olympic organizers, we are left to wonder about the value-system that puts sports ahead of other human values, including respect for fallen comrades.

For British director Kevin Macdonald, the events of 1972 were part of history, and not a particularly well-known history.

"A lot of people of my generation didn't know anything of it at all," he said.

When he began studying the event, he was surprised by the Germans' refusal to come clean on what had actually transpired. Their stonewalling spurred him on to see the 2½-year project completed.

"What really drove it for me was the injustice of it, and that the Germans were covering it up for so long," he said.

At first, he found it almost impossible to get Germans involved in the event to speak on camera. They were still too embarrassed by the fiasco and their ineptitude in dealing with it.

His research revealed plenty of reasons for embarrassment: the Germans were completely unprepared for a terrorist attack; the IOC wanted the terrorists and their hostages moved out of the Olympic village so the Games could go on; West Germany turned down Israeli offers for military help; they hastily summoned untrained police officers to deal with the situation; they did not prepare the police for the airport shootout with the terrorists; some police, who were supposed to be lying in ambush, decided at the last minute they were too untrained to tackle the terrorists and abandoned their posts; an insufficient number of snipers was put in place to handle the terrorists; there was no central authority controlling events on the German side.

We learn that an order for armoured units was only given after a gun battle began at the airport and that the battle went on for over an hour before the last of the terrorists, seeing the situation was hopeless, threw a grenade into one helicopter holding bound Israelis and strafed another with machine gun fire, killing all the hostages.

In what is one of the most damaging revelations in the film, Macdonald claims Germany did not want to hold onto the three surviving terrorists, for fear of retaliation. Germany colluded in a hijacking of a Lufthansa airliner that had only about a dozen passengers on board and no women or children, Macdonald asserts. The West German government quickly agreed to trade the three surviving terrorists for the plane and its passengers. The terrorists, released to Libya, were greeted as heroes, as had been the five slain terrorists, whose coffins were carried aloft by an ecstatic crowd during their funeral.

Mentioned in a postscript was that Israel set up a special assassination squad to hunt down the remaining terrorists and their handlers.

Al Gashey is unrepentant, "though as an individual, he feels remorse for the families," Macdonald said. He feels that "it was war and he still feels glad that he did it."

No wonder he still feels he has to live in hiding.

ספרותנו

משורר לאומי: אני? יחודה עמיחי 1924-2000

ובעיניו אשף מתים בידי שם,
מתים רבים אשף לפעני,
שאבירים בפצעיו ואוהבם
ולא אמות פסוחם בזעה...
חוא מלא עיניו בחם וחוא שתף:
אל כל סלחמותי יוגא אני."

"אני, עליו חשלום, אני, חתי אומר
עליו חשלום - אני רוצה שלום בבד
עבשיו בעולמי חי..."

בעזה חתעקל, חזקני נא אך חמעם./
ופה יחיה בעם חבאה!"

כל-כך פשוט וכל-כך מתוככם;

"משה חרים את שתי ידיו/
בעבד נבד חעמלקים ידי לחזק את חלוחמים./
ובמעט זה סיפן לכניעה."

"וחדלת מצלחלת ומטעטה בבחלת..."

"בני חתעייף לעבוא. חבאנו אותו למחנה עם כל חנערים./ עבשיו עם בני נוסף לעמים שונבדים מבני בחלונות אוסובוסים... עבשיו עם בני בתנת בחלון, קטן בכלים על מבכבים."

קובץ השירים חחדש, פתוח סגור פתוח, חפך מיד לרב מכר; באמצע שנות חשבעים שלו, כתב עמיחי ספר בקול גדול,ושוב חעניק לנו אוצר.

"פתוח סגור פתוח. לפני שעדם עלך חבל פתוח בקוסו בקליני. בשחוא מי חבל קשר או בלניי. ובשחוא את חבל שוב פתוח. פתוח קשר פתוח. זה קל האדם."

CRAZY LASAGNA

2 lb. plum tomatoes, seeded and quartered
1 lb. thin eggplants (about 4) or 1 large eggplant, cut in 1/2 inch slices
1 lb. zucchini (about 2), sliced
1/2 lb. portobello mushrooms, trimmed and cut in chunks
2 sweet red peppers, cut in chunks
1 large onion, cut in chunks
2 tbsp. olive oil
Salt and pepper, to taste
2 heads garlic
1/4 lb. lasagna noodles, broken up
2 cups pureed tomatoes or tomato sauce
1/2 lb. light ricotta cheese
1/4 cup shredded fresh basil or parsley
1 tbsp. chopped fresh oregano, or 1/2 tsp. dried
1/2 lb. part-skim mozzarella, cut in small chunks
2 tbsp. grated Parmesan cheese

Arrange tomatoes, eggplants, zucchini, mushrooms, peppers and onion on two baking sheets lined with parchment paper. Drizzle with olive oil; sprinkle with salt and pepper. Cut top quarter off garlic heads and wrap garlic in foil. Place on baking sheet.

Roast vegetables in a preheated oven at 400 for 45 minutes, or until browned.

In a large bowl, combine noodles with roasted vegetables. Squeeze in garlic. Add pureed tomatoes, ricotta, basil, oregano and mozzarella. Taste and adjust seasonings.

Transfer mixture to a 13x9 inch or 3 1/2-litre round baking dish; sprinkle with Parmesan. Cover and bake in a preheated oven at 350 for 30 minutes. Uncover and cook 20 to 30 minutes longer, until lightly browned. Allow to rest for 10 minutes before serving. Makes 8 servings. Serve hot or at room temperature.

Solidarity In Action

Twenty UJA FEDERATION leaders from the Greater Toronto Area are winding up a whirlwind six-day solidarity mission to Israel. The October 29 - November 3 mission connected participants with key Israeli politicians in a series of top level briefings. The mission was highlighted by a Jerusalem rally which included participants from North American Jewish communities, new immigrants and Israelis.

For Golda Brown, the decision to be part of the UJA FEDERATION mission was easy and instant. "All my life, I've gone to Israel for the chagim or on vacation - in the good times. But now is when we have to be there," Brown explained. "We need to fill the hotels and shops and show the world that we're unafraid, strong and united."

Harry Gorman was also part of the UJA FEDERATION solidarity contingent and he, too, stressed the importance of visiting Israel at this time."If the people of Israel can live and work in the midst of this trauma," he explained, "we can at least spend a few days there showing our care and support. We also have an important part to play," he continued, "in seeing first hand what is really happening, what the media is saying and what they're not."

Building on the success of this first solidarity mission, additional trips are being planned as messages of unity with the people and government of Israel.

Last week, Toronto Jewish community members started their morning by participating in a UJA FEDERATION-sponsored Israel Support-a-thon, the opportunity to call family and friends in Israel to express concern and solidarity.

During a recent solidarity mission, a delegation of North American Jewish Federation leaders made a condolence call to the widow of one of the Israeli officers killed by Palestinians in Ramallah. Photo courtesy of: United Jewish Communities.

Donors, volunteers and agency representatives contacted more than 100 people, including residents of our Partnership 2000 region in Eilat-Eilot. Many of those called described low morale, uncertainty, tension and, most importantly, the need for Canadian Jews to maintain contact and to visit. Norm Kaman, together with his wife and daughter, attended the Israel Support-a-thon. "One of the calls I made was to a long-time family friend in Beersheva. Her voice was cracking as she told me how hard it is to understand the violence and how much our call meant."

Calling All Contributors

UJA FEDERATION Campaign 2001 -- The Campaign For Our Children - is making a special effort to reach 8000 of last year's contributors who have yet to make their annual gift. According to Campaign Chairs Ron Frisch and Ed Sonshine, contributions from these donors will propel the campaign to its goal of $45 million.

Campaign Co-Chair Ed Sonshine (l) with Ronnie Appleby at last week's canvasser briefing.

"We are two thirds of the way there, but now we need the support of every single donor to make it all the way," said Frisch. The campaign total currently stands at $30 million, with nearly $3.5 million in increased contributions, representing a 13% increase over last year at this time.

Ron Frisch (l) Campaign 2001 Co-Chair, with Mark Usher at the recent "card pull-in."

Last week, UJA FEDERATION's leading canvassers handed in completed pledge cards representing nearly $6 million in gifts. The "card pull-in" was held at the office of Campaign Co-Chair Ed Sonshine, where participants heard a briefing on the Israel situation from Toronto's Julia Koschitzky and Jerusalem Report Editor David Horovitz.

Further information, as well as Campaign For Our Children updates, are available at UJA FEDERATION's Website www.jewishtoronto.net. You can also donate on line conveniently and securely.

Car bomb claims two victims

Jerusalem residents skeptical about peace

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — A car bomb exploded in the heart of Jerusalem, killing two people less than 24 hours after Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat and Knesset member Shimon Peres agreed to call a truce in the escalating Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The bomb exploded in a side street near Machane Yehuda market at 3 p.m. (local time) on Nov. 2, one hour after the ceasefire had been scheduled to go into effect. The blast claimed the life of 24-year-old Ayelet Levy, the daughter of Yitzhak Levy, leader of the National Religious Party, as well as 32-year-old Hanan Levy (no relation). The terrorist escaped on foot.

"The rumours of a ceasefire didn't make it to Jerusalem," said Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert at the scene of the attack, which wounded nine. "There are those saying we were lucky this time because only two people were killed. What luck? People died and people were wounded."

"I thought the explosion was a plane breaking the sound barrier," said Michael Friedland, who works at a butcher shop in the market. "Then the ambulances came. The shuk [market] was busy right before the attack but it emptied within two to three minutes. I can't blame people [for leaving]."

Edmonton synagogues hit by arson

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Edmonton synagogues were fire-bombed last week, one of them for the second time since Mideast violence flared in late September.

There were no injuries, and damage was light at both the Beth Shalom Synagogue in downtown Edmonton and the Beth Israel Synagogue in the city's west end. The attacks took place within half an hour of each other in the early morning hours last Wednesday.

Less than two days later, police arrested a suspect in connection with the first incident. Twenty-year-old Yousef Sandouga was charged with one count of arson involving the Beth Shalom synagogue.

Sandouga "is a person of interest" in connection with the second arson incident, said Edmonton police spokesperson Wes Bellmore.

Police charge suspect

In the first incident at Beth Shalom, a window was broken and a Molotov cocktail tossed into the building, but it failed to ignite fully and caused only minor scorching marks, said Neil Loomer, ritual director of the shul.

A neighbour was alerted to the incident and scared off the perpetrator, who appeared to be carrying other Molotov cocktails, Loomer said. Police later found a Molotov cocktail and an empty glass container on the ground beside the synagogue wall.

A little later that night, the Beth Israel was attacked with an incendiary device, which blew out windows because of the heat, and caused a little more damage than the previous incident.

"They threw a gasoline bomb, a Molotov cocktail," said Martin Abugov, a spokesperson for the Beth Israel congregation.

Abugov said cost of repairs will exceed $1,000. "We're going to have to replace two large windows and [clean] smoke marks between the windows up to the top of the building," he said.

"I'm extremely dismayed. I personally put five years into the construction of this building."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Blast Condemned

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Committee and Canadian Jewish Congress last week condemned the car bomb attack in Jerusalem that left two Israelis dead and injured at least 18 others.

"Much responsibility for this attack must be placed squarely on Yasser Arafat for continuing to incite violence, releasing Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorists from prison, and refusing to impose discipline over the Tanzim and other militant factions that are openly collaborating with Hamas," said CIC national chair Joseph Wilder.

"This is a heinous and cowardly attack by those who seek to derail even the possibility of peace. Yasser Arafat must immediately take action to arrest the terrorists he has previously released and to ensure such attacks cannot take place again in the future. He must be held accountable," said CJC president Moshe Ronen, who was in Israel as part of a Canadian solidarity mission.

ISRAEL

Harassment Trial

JERUSALEM — Former Israeli cabinet minister Yitzhak Mordechai went on trial last week on charges of sexually harassing three women over the course of eight years. Mordechai has denied the allegations.

Shul Vandalized

JERUSALEM — A synagogue in a West Bank settlement was vandalized last week, and Israeli police suspect Palestinians are at fault. The vandals painted graffiti and swastikas, flooded the building and stole money from the charity boxes of the Efrat synagogue last Friday.

Wagner Played

JERUSALEM — A musical taboo in Israel was broken last week when the Rishon leZion Symphony Orchestra performed a work by Adolf Hitler's favourite composer, Richard Wagner. Efforts by Holocaust survivor groups to block the performance failed after the Supreme Court refused to intervene, citing freedom of expression. But the performance was not without disruption. As the first notes of Wagner's Siegfried Idyll filled the hall, a Polish-born survivor swung a noisemaker in protest.

WORLD

Casino Folds

JERICHO — The Oasis Casino in Jericho closed indefinitely last week because ongoing violence created a sharp drop in business. Israelis, who constitute the majority of the casino's clientele, have been barred from entering the Palestinian autonomous areas because of the unrest.

Reform Gathering

MOSCOW — Reform Jewish leaders from around the world gathered in Moscow this week to celebrate 10 years of Reform activity in the former Soviet Union. The movement now boasts a presence in nearly 90 communities there.

Broadcasts of Trial

PARIS — French television launched a month-long series of daily broadcasts from the 1987 trial of the Nazi official known as the Butcher of Lyon. The trial, in which Klaus Barbie was jailed for life for sending thousands of French Jews and Resistance fighters to the death camps, was the first French trial by jury to be filmed. Barbie, the Gestapo police chief in Lyon during the war, died in prison in 1991.

Counter Protest

BERLIN — Some 25,000 people demonstrated in Germany last week against the recent wave of neo-Nazi violence across the country. The head of Germany's Jewish community said at the demonstration in Dusseldorf that Germans must not remain silent when neo-Nazis strike.

Nazis March

COEUR d'ALÈNE, Idaho — About 35 neo-Nazis marched through the streets of this quiet town to protest a judge's decision that upheld a $6.3 million verdict against the Aryan Nations. The marchers, who were outnumbered by nearly 400 counter-demonstrators, were led by four men carrying a sign that read, "Jewish Treason Governs America."

Sainthood Flap

PRAGUE — Five Israeli historians are calling on the Vatican to halt plans to canonize a Slovak Catholic bishop. The historians charge that the late Bishop Jan Vojtassak was a senior official in the pro-Nazi wartime Slovak government. During a visit to Slovakia in 1995, Pope John Paul suggested that Vojtassak could be a candidate for sainthood because he suffered at the hands of the Communists.

Embassy Moves

WASHINGTON — Newspaper reports last week said Al Gore told a group of Arab American leaders that he opposes moving the U.S. Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. Meantime, a former U.S. congressman said George W. Bush has changed his mind about moving the American Embassy to Jerusalem.

Bleak Times Seen in Yugoslavia

BELGRADE — Yugoslavia's 3,000 Jews, about half of whom live in Belgrade, see their future closely linked to the fate of the country as a whole.

Highly integrated, mostly secular and often intermarried, they share the hardships and aspirations of their neighbours.

The past decade of war, economic sanctions and dictatorial rule turned Yugoslavia into an economic disaster and made it a political pariah.

Today, with the Balkan winter looming, the economic crisis presents the most urgent immediate challenges for Jews and non-Jews alike.

"The economic situation is catastrophic, not just for Jews but for everyone," says Aca Singer, the 78-year-old president of the Federation of Yugoslav Jewish Communities. "Both the state and inhabitants are practically left without any financial or food reserves."

Daily blackouts around the country cut power for four to six hours at a time, and prices of basic goods such as meat, oil and sugar have skyrocketed. Among the hardest hit have been senior citizens, who make up more than a fifth of Yugoslav Jews.

Faith groups rally for private school funding

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish students and educators marched side by side with members of the Sikh, Muslim and Greek Orthodox religions last week in a noisy, downtown noon-hour rally to call for full funding of all faith-based school systems.

The rally came on the first anniversary of the finding by the United Nations that Canada, specifically Ontario, discriminates against non-Catholics by publicly funding Catholic schools but not other religious schools.

Ontario has more or less ignored the UN decision, while Canada has said education is a provincial matter.

Marchers called on Premier Mike Harris to extend full funds to all independent schools. They also made use of the federal election campaign to call on Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to rectify the inequality through tax breaks and other measures.

Harris was loudly booed by marchers, as was the name of Elinor Caplan, the Liberal MP for Thornhill and federal minister of citizenship and immigration.

In a related development, The Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS) was unveiled last Sunday. The new umbrella group will bring together community organizations, parents and all Jewish day schools to press the government as a united front.

The group has been in the formative stages since last spring, when representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith, the Board of Jewish Education and grassroots parents organizations met to explore setting up a single voice to lobby for funding.

Worthwhile reading

From the editor's desk

From time to time in this space, I like to bring worthwhile reading to the attention of CJN readers. In this issue, I commend two works, one a book, the other a booklet.

Any novel whose title sings forth the lyric magic of The Possibility of Dreaming on a Night Without Stars, deserves to be read. And this novel dances with the music of its title.

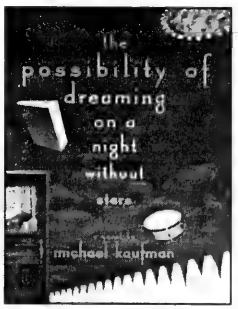
It is thoughtful and deftly written. Author Michael Kaufman spins an imaginative tale about a middle-aged teacher in Cleveland, divorced, father of two teenagers. In the course of one fateful summer, he must struggle with the sudden convergence of the essential, pressing issues of his life, indeed of all human life.

The plot moves quickly with a skilled artistry and esthetic that at times is reminiscent in its technique of Dylan Thomas' poetry, as when the narrator, Eli Schuman, states: "I saw her body, brown and golden in the colours of the stream." Its narrative power is reminiscent of Tolstoy, as when Eli finally, near the end of the story, grasps the painful but significant truths of his life.

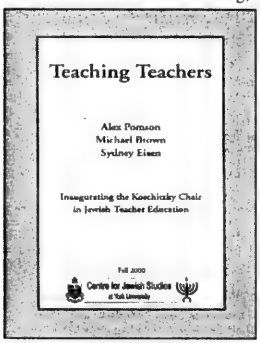
Eli, a successful teacher but frustrated writer, decides one summer day to follow the trail of a bizarre but possibly serendipitous tip about Marilyn Monroe. The tip represents for him the opportunity to write that one great story he has never had the courage to begin.

In pursuit of the rumour that Marilyn Monroe might still be alive somewhere in the rustic and rolling farmland of rural Ohio, Eli comes face to face with and must battle the pernicious encroachers upon human dignity and self-esteem: doubt, confusion, indecision, denial and shame.

Without inhibition, Kaufman explores many of life's ultimate issues: love, death, education, parenting and filiality. He also explores the "problems" of Jewish identity that are commonplace for so many of our co-religionists who are minimally educated in the ways of Judaism, and live what we might call unaffiliated Jewish lives.



"Dreaming" is a metaphor for individual striving, for the cherishing of private hopes and the ability to find the courage to act on aspiration. In the end, Eli learns how to "dream," how to see past the clouds and into heaven's ever-present starlit sky.



This is not an epic saga. It is, however, an entertaining, poignant story replete with gentle didacticisms, insightful descriptions and surprise plot twists about the vast, still mostly unexplored domain of the human heart.

The Possibility of Dreaming on a Night Without Stars is published in paperback by Viking Penguin Books Canada Limited.

Teaching Teachers is a booklet published by The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University celebrating the inauguration of the Koschitzky Chair in Jewish Teacher Education.

In addition to a brief foreword by the centre's director, Michael Brown, it contains two essays. The first is co-authored by Brown, Sydney Eisen, the Centre's founding director, and Alex Pomson, the holder of the Koschitzky Chair and director of the Jewish Teacher Education Program at York. It describes the purpose, philosophy, history and methodology of the innovative and internationally applauded Jewish Teacher Education Program. The second is an anthology, compiled and "annotated" by Pomson, of mini-autobiographical sketches by three alumni of the program.

The alumni now work in distinct, Jewish education-related fields – teaching, planning and administration. But the paths for the alumni to each of those fields has been through the Jewish Teacher Education Program.

The three mini-sketches are a helpful, peer-poignant guide for any youngsters curious about the uniquely gratifying fulfilment to be had in a career in Jewish education and for any parents seeking unobtrusive yet meaningful ways in which to assist their children in striving to find their future and their place in a community that needs and relies upon each and every one of them.

Alliance's Day makes pitch for Jewish votes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Alliance leader Stockwell Day last week made a whirlwind appearance at the Beth Avraham Yosef Synagogue of Toronto and presented a trio of wedge issues designed to separate the Jewish community from the Liberal party.

Election 2000

For further coverage please see pages 16–22

Delivered to an enthusiastic audience at a nomination meeting in the suburban constituency of Thornhill, Day's speech blasted the Liberals for supporting a United Nations vote critical of Israel. He also promised tax relief for parents sending their children to Jewish schools and he denied any Alliance links to anti-Semitism.

"There have been unfounded and hurtful attempts to link the Canadian Alliance to anti-Semitism in the past," Day told a crowd of about 500. "I oppose racist and anti-Semitic views and those who propagate them, with every ounce of my being.

"The Canadian Alliance will have a policy of zero tolerance for these kinds of views."

Day may have been responding to reports that focused on his role in the mid-1980s as an administrator at a Bible school in Bentley, Alta. The curriculum used at the fundamentalist school reportedly included a question that asked students whether it was true "Jewish leaders were children of their father, the devil?"

In addition, a report prepared by former senator Ron Ghitter, which examined the Accelerated Christian Education curriculum used by the school, found it included "a degree of insensitivity towards blacks, Jews and natives."

Although he mentioned none of these issues specifically, Day explicitly distanced the Alliance from racism: "We must always be vigilant against anti-Semitism and other kinds of racist and intolerant views," he said.

The audience responded warmly to those comments, but it was his criticism of Canada's vote at the United Nations that prompted the loudest cheer.

The UN resolution was "one-sided" and it "singled out Israel as the sole party to blame in the latest outburst of violence," he said.

"It was unbalanced because it only referred to casualties on one side, because it did not call on both sides to rein in violence in their communities and because it referred to the holy sites in Jerusalem only by the Arab name, Haram al Sharif, and not also by the Jewish name of Temple Mount."

"It was embarrassing and unsettling to see Canada support his kind of resolution in an international forum," he said.

Day then turned his guns on Thornhill MP Elinor Caplan, who, he said,"was nowhere to be found" when the Jewish community rallied in support of Israel three weeks ago.

"If Canada is to be seen as an even-handed party in the peace process that will be trusted by both sides, we cannot support unbalanced resolutions of this kind," he added.

Day attracted more applause when he stated the Alliance would reform the tax system to "recognize the costs associated with sending children to non-publicly funded schools. We want to see all parents and all children treated fairly, regardless of religion or denomination."

Day's pitch found receptive ears among several members of the audience. "I think the Liberals are disgusting to have voted against Israel in the last resolution," said Martin Charney.

Aaron Franco and two friends – all of Israeli origin – say they have not made up their minds how they'll vote on Nov. 27. They wanted to hear Day discuss the issues before finalizing their choices but Franco said he was "absolutely upset" by Canada's UN vote.

Tax reforms welcomed by audience

Eddie, who declined to give his last name, said "it makes me upset that Canada voted against Israel, a democratic country with human rights. It's not fair."

Sheryl Steiner, a member of Ontario Parents for Equality in Education Funding (OPEEF), believes Day's stand on school funding and Israel appeals to Jewish voters.

"A lot of people are very angry with the Liberals on the Israel issue and that we are constantly passing the buck on the education issue," said Steiner, who has three children in day schools. "We've had enough."

"I think what you are seeing is enormous frustration in this riding," said Georganne Burke, OPEEF's director of operations. "People are upset about the lack of [school] funding. People are very hot about the vote at the United Nations."

Day, she continued, "speaks in a language that people identify with, values, principles, families, the need to recognize hard working people. That's what people in this riding are about."

Asked about Day's role at the Alberta school, Burke said she has met with the Alliance leader and "I asked him those questions and specifically raked this issue over the coals. The man is not an anti-Semite. He wouldn't teach his children that Jews are the children of the devil. That's what I believe."

Rwanda genocide appears hauntingly familiar

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The words had a sickening familiarity. Mass murder of the innocent. The world knew and did nothing. Neighbour turned against neighbour. The perpetrators were just doing their job. The demonization of the victims. It never happened.

But the program at Ryerson Polytechnic University during Holocaust Education Week was not about the Jews in Europe. It was about the genocide by Hutu militia of over one million (some estimates are over two million) members of the Tutsi tribe, as well as some moderate Hutu people, in Rwanda.

And it happened not 50 years ago, but in three months in the spring of 1994.

Léo Kabilisa, who lost his father, brothers, aunt, cousins and nieces, told a stunned and silent audience "Don't say never again. It's not never again."

Kabilisa escaped from Rwanda in 1990, when sporadic massacres were already taking place, and now lives and teaches in Canada.

The focus of the program, which was sponsored by the Holocaust Education Week Committee and the Hope for Rwanda's Children Fund, was an hour-long film titled Rwanda: In Search of Hope.

The film, produced and directed by Peter Raymont, followed a group of Canadian teachers and community workers who went to Rwanda to try to understand what happened, and to see what they could do to help the estimated half-a-million orphans left behind.

For further coverage please see pages 23–26

The film showed bodies of the victims left as a memorial where they were killed – often in churches and schools where they had gone for shelter. Whole villages were wiped out, and new ones created to house women and children who had managed to survive.

One girl of 14 is caring for her four brothers and sisters. A woman begs the tour members to take her son, because she fears she can't protect and care for him.

There is a debate about how best to memorialize the victims. In many places, the bones of the victims are stacked in piles and rows. In other places, remains of bodies lie, their belongings beside them.

Kabilisa questions this approach, saying he feels that it takes away the dignity of the murdered ones.

He also questions the fact that the Canadian government isn't prosecuting Rwandan "war criminals" who are living in Canada.

There are also thousands of the Hutu militia in prisons in Rwanda. The courts don't have the facilities to prosecute them, Kabilisa said, and some are being transferred to local courts, and even being allowed to return to private life.

JVS WORKERS ON STRIKE FOR FAIRNESS

The 80 frontline workers at JVS (Jewish Vocational Service) have gone on strike to fight for decent wages and working conditions.

Here's why the members of CUPE Local 2137 - who provide job counselling, educational and vocational services, along with a long list of other services - have taken this dramatic action:

- There are several major issues still outstanding, including – unbelievably – an employer demand for concessions to our Jewish Holidays.
- Wages are also a major issue. They were essentially frozen between 1992-1997 and the agency has now offered a paltry increase for one year.
- Some JVS staff make up to $20,000 less than their counterparts in similar agencies.
- JVS has had more than 50 staff leave the agency in the last two years, because they were fed up with being treated like second-class employees.

Some history is in order. JVS was founded as a Jewish organization in 1947, offering assistance to survivors of the Nazi Holocaust new to Canada. Over its 53-year history, it has grown to a multi-service agency that serves all people, and has earned great respect in both the general and Jewish communities. This is in no small part due to the hard work and commitment of its staff.

You can help bring this dispute to a fair and reasonable resolve. Contact JVS Executive Director Karen Goldenberg or Board President Morris Milner at (416) 787-1151. Remind them what JVS is supposed to stand for!

IT'S TIME JVS WORKED FOR ITS EMPLOYEES!

What Canada could do

Merely hours after Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat agreed last week to a truce in the spiralling violence gripping the West Bank, Gaza and parts of Israel, two murderers belonging to Islamic Jihad ignited a car laden with explosives beside the Machane Yehuda market in Jerusalem. Two Israelis were killed; 11 were injured.

The official announcement by the people who sent the two murderers read, in part, "Islamic Jihad takes responsibility for the heroic act undertaken in the heart of conquered Jerusalem this afternoon." Of note in their official announcement was the characterization of the craven car-bombing as "heroic" and of Jerusalem as being "conquered."

The "heroism" of the car bombing is of a piece with the "heroism" of lynching, of suicide-bombing, of sending children to places of danger, of shooting from behind those children towards Israeli soldiers, of using ambulances to carry munitions, of using textbooks to teach children hatred, of using classrooms to extoll that hatred into intifadah, of using mosques to send worshippers onto the streets frenzied and enraged, seeking to fulfil their "heroic," even "religious" obligation to spill Jewish blood.

That Machane Yehudah is in west Jerusalem is but an incidental, inconvenient detail for the haters of Jews. They regard all of Jerusalem, as indeed they regard all of Israel, to be "conquered" territory. Their intention, as proclaimed two weeks ago in Friday prayers at the Al-Aksa mosque, is simply to "purify the land of the Jews." Thus, with them, there can be no negotiation towards a peaceful resolution of the conflict.

When confronted by the media to comment on the bombing, Yasser Arafat said he was opposed to such actions. But Israelis were hard-pressed to find any sincerity in the chairman's statement. Indeed anyone who has followed the unravelling of the seven-year Israeli-Palestinian entente since the failed Camp David meeting in July, would be hard-pressed to find any sincerity of any kind in Arafat.

But whether or not a differentiation between the intentions of Arafat and the methods of Islamic Jihad is warranted, the car-bombing last week cries out for a forceful Western response. The Western democracies must publicly and unambiguously condemn the militant Islamic organizations and their sponsors. The democracies must make plain that, under no circumstances, will the West ever support or give succour to such hate-filled purposes and bloodthirsty tactics. The West must also demand from Yasser Arafat that he, too, unambiguously condemn such purposes and tactics, and that he take the necessary steps to prevent these acts from recurring.

Condemnation of the aims and activities of organizations such as Islamic Jihad, Hamas and Hezbollah is not condemnation of the legitimate aspiration of the Palestinian people to govern themselves. In fact the opposite is true. A differentiation between the two would bring an end to the conflict much sooner. This would be the best aid to the Palestinian people.

The governments of the West know this. And Canada could take the initiative to underscore the point for the sake of the Palestinians, the Israelis and the world.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

I am dismayed by the prominent picture, in colour no less, of Roni Milo with Elinor Caplan and Art Eggleton (CJN, Oct. 26). There was no expression of their opposition to their government's position, no attempt on their part to explain their position or perhaps their inability to explain their position. The picture (to me) implies their support of Israel.

I have not seen or heard anything publicly about their support for Israel. With an election coming, I feel that this is electioneering on the part of The CJN. Also neither of them were at the community rally at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto. I am aware that Caplan was in the Maritimes. For once, a politician saved some taxpayers' money in not getting on an aircraft in a hurry.

It should come as no surprise that the Liberal party voted to condemn Israel at the United Nations. This is the same party that held power and turned away boatloads of Jews during the war years to die in Nazi camps.

What is a surprise is that Herb Gray, a Jew, is the deputy prime minister of the Liberals. There are those among us who would "sell their Jewish souls" in order to maintain power.

Shame on Canada

Shame on Canada and the outgoing foreign minister Lloyd Axworthy for voting in favour of the United Nations Security Council resolution condemning Israel and blaming Israel for the recent outbreak of violence. Is it not ironic that 25 years ago on Oct. 19, 1975, the UN adopted an Arab inspired draft resolution that equated Zionism with racism? Certainly, as far as Israel is concerned, nothing ever changes at the United Nations. Canadian Jewry can show its solidarity with the State of Israel by voting anything but Liberal in the forthcoming election.

MPP concerned over violence

Like many in our community, I am deeply concerned about the ongoing violence in Israel.

In July, I was in Israel with my family and had great optimism about the prospect of peace. My wife and I took our children to many historic and holy sites to connect them with our heritage. We all had a strong sense that we were going to witness peace and stability in our time. However, recent events have shaken that sense of hope and optimism. I am truly saddened by the recent violence in Israel and the harm that it has done to the peace process.

I was also saddened by the federal government's decision to support the recent UN resolution condemning Israel for "excessive use of force." Last month, I wrote to my federal counterpart, Jim Peterson, to express my disappointment with the Liberal government's decision to support the resolution. I asked him to work with the prime minister and the minister of foreign affairs to assist the international community in restoring the peace process in the Middle East.

I have also personally raised this issue with Opposition leader Stockwell Day, who has spoken out against the federal government's unbalanced stand on the issue.

Canada has a real opportunity to play a leadership role in returning stability to the Middle East and putting the peace process back on track. I only hope that, after this federal election campaign is over, the new government will take a more responsible and positive approach to ending the violence in the region and bringing peace in our time.

Applaud Rabbi Scheim

Re: Article on "Women's Ritual Role is Changing" (CJN, Oct. 12). I was pleasantly surprised to learn from my mom about Rabbi Scheim's sermon stating that women should be allowed more involvement in synagogue.

This is a similar debate to the one I had with Rabbi Scheim about 10 years ago when I was preparing for my bat mitzvah at Beth David. At the time, I was shocked to discover that anything I read in synagogue "didn't count" as a mitzvah and thus had to be followed up by a male reading of those texts. This made no sense to me. Had I not practised thoroughly? Did I not know the texts practically by heart?

The message I received was that women do not count in synagogue. At that moment, I felt incredibly isolated from my culture and religion and became increasingly less involved at Beth David. The arguments that Rabbi Scheim lists for the inclusion of women have always seemed to me to be based on common sense and logic.

I want to applaud Rabbi Scheim and the committee for being leaders and taking the first of many radical steps towards ensuring all congregants are welcome at Beth David. It is my hope that other synagogues will follow suit in the next years. Seeing women represented on the bimah will encourage young women to stay connected with their cultural roots. I know I certainly would have appreciated it.

Perspectives

Jewish art: history, halachah and philosophy

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

In the modern period, following the emancipation of Jews and our entry into the world of Western culture, many collections of Jewish art have been assembled.

Whether public or private, looted or intact, these collections consist primarily of religious items – illuminated manuscripts, chanukiyot, ketubot, and other material expressions of Jewish religious activity.

In recent years, we have witnessed an explosion of contemporary Judaic art, to be found in museums, for sale at private auctions, at the annual Jerusalem Arts Fair, and even in our own neighbourhood.

The creation of these religious articles follows the rabbinic understanding of Exodus 15:5: "This is my God and I shall exalt Him." The rabbis of the Talmud inquire, "How is God to be exalted?"

The question is immediately answered: God is to be "exalted" by preparing a beautiful sukkah ... and with specially crafted tfillin. That is, all this art is utilitarian, not l'art pour l'art, but for hiddur mitzvah, to exalt the religious deed. It is for the glorification of God.

If we would seek a Jewish esthetic, where would we begin? Following Maimonides, who chose to explicate the nature of God through the via negativa, we shall also begin with the negative, indicating what is not Jewish art.

While there are other works of art which reflect the life of a Jew, depicting Jews at prayer or in our homes, as well as paintings by artists considered to be Jewish, I do not consider these works to be Jewish art. Rembrandt's portrayal of a Sephardi rabbi or Chagall's imagery of crucifixion is not Jewish any more than my drawing of a Chinese woman is Chinese art.

Let us continue on a negative path for a bit longer, for Judaism has been taken to be profoundly iconoclastic. The best-known opposition to art in Judaism is found in the record of the foundational experience of the Jewish encounter with God. The Ten Commandments include the injunction, "You shall not make for yourselves an image or any likeness of that which is in the heavens above, the earth beneath or the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them." (Exodus 20:4-5).

These verses and others (Deuteronomy 4:16-18 and 5:8) appear to prohibit making any image, especially any representation of God.

In contrast to the verbal, written and musical arts, which are well represented in Judaism, this commandment is usually cited as the reason for the paucity of plastic and graphic art in the Jewish tradition. Yet, as Jewish historian Cecil Roth has observed, "At every stage of their history the Jews and their ancestors of biblical times expressed themselves in various art forms which inevitably reflect contemporary styles and fashions and the environment in which they lived ... Jews have constantly produced or made use of objects which appealed in some fashion to their aesthetic sense."

How might we explain this tension between what Roth has described as both "revulsion and attraction?"

In the later biblical period and throughout classical antiquity, in an environment in which the worship of images was a significant part of the surrounding culture, Jews reacted strongly against this practice.

Yet, the Torah states that among the Israelites who left Egypt were artists Bezalel and Oholiab who were accomplished "in all manner of workmanship, to work in gold and in silver and in brass, and in the cutting of stones for setting, and in the carving of wood, to make any manner of skilful work." (Exodus 35:31-35)

The women were skilled in embroidery. Their designs extended beyond non-representational craft. For despite the disastrous episode of the golden calf, the wilderness sanctuary included a pair of cherubim whose wings extended over the Ark. These figures were also a part of the First Temple, thus indicating that the Israelites did not absolutely prohibit plastic art. Authorized images for the proper worship of God were permitted.

After the destruction of the Temple and the later failure of the revolt against Rome, the rabbis of the Land of Israel, surrounded by the physical images of Roman culture, appear to have accepted them as part of the reality of their society – even the images of alien deities. The most famous literary example is that of Rabban Gamliel, who dismissed the concern of his students and entered the Roman bathhouse where an image of Jupiter was displayed, maintaining that it was placed there for decoration only.

In the 20th century, the history of Jewish art moved beyond textual references to encompass archeological evidence of synagogue imagery.

From Sotheby's Catalogue

Gilt silver book binding, probably Polish, late 17th or early 18th century.

A visit to the Israel Museum or to actual archeological sites such as Tzippori will reveal the depiction of birds, animals and even people in ancient mosaics.

At Beth Tzedec, we enjoy Shabbat kiddush over a reproduction of the mosaic floor of the Bet Alpha synagogue (which caused a stir when first excavated by Sukenik in 1928).

In the Middle Ages, Jews found themselves living in two very different religious cultures. Christianity with its incarnation theology lent itself to church iconography, while Islam placed great stress on iconoclasm and the absolute prohibition of any images.

Where Jews lived affected their attitude toward representational art. For example, in Islamic Spain, the Sefer hachinuch (39, 12) emphasized that it was forbidden to make likenesses of a human being out of any material. Maimonides, following a family tradition which often used the Yerushalmi as a source of law, was a bit less severe, forbidding the human form in sculpture, but permitted it in painting and tapestries (Mishneh Torah, Laws About Foreign Worship 3:10-11).

From Sotheby's Catalogue

In northern Europe, under the rule of Christendom, the situation was different. Cecil Roth reports that generally representational art was acceptable. For example, in the 12th century, Ephraim ben Issac of Regensburg permitted the painting of animals and birds on the walls of a synagogue.

In the 12th century, the Tosafists of Franco-Germany discussed and permitted even the three-dimensional representation of the human form, provided that it was incomplete. In Ashkenaz we find liturgical manuscripts, printed books, and ritual objects with representations of the human form – sometimes even three-dimensional.

Clearly some aspect of our attitude depended on the surrounding cultural norms. Nonetheless, when rabbis did permit representational art, they limited its scope, prohibiting the imaging of God and human beings.

In allowing images of the manifold works of creation, but not full three-dimensional sculptures or portrayals of human beings, the rabbis gave birth to what the late Steven Schwartzschild termed "the theology of the slashed nose." Schwartzschild, who sought to articulate a theory of Jewish esthetics, which I find most intriguing, contended that by permitting the depiction of humans only with a bird's head or a facial distortion, the rabbis articulated an important principle. A bird's head or slashed nose would indicate that what one saw did not represent the ensouled or inspirited object.

Rachel Wischnitzer referred to this as the "Jewish principle of incompleteness." Schwartzschild claimed that in this we find something akin to the modernist notion of distortion which may legitimately be claimed as a fundamental principle of Jewish esthetics.

If Greek esthetics emphasized mimesis, imitation, Judaism recognized that true creativity (beri'ah) belonged only to God. Humans could approximate God through yetzirah, the formation or crafting of something which would be new – different from God's work in this world.

Schwartzschild pointed to Arnold Schoenberg's opera Moses and Aaron, which was staged this past year in New York. This work reaches its climax when Moses destroys the golden calf and says (not sings), "Perish, you embodiment of the impossibility of putting the Infinite in an image!" In a similar manner, the elongated forms of Modigliani and the masked wraps of George Segal become examples not of mimesis, but of the crafting of alternate visions of the human being.

If, as claimed earlier, the purpose of Jewish art is not contemplation or beauty for its own sake, but religious action – which links one to God and to other people – then there is another principle which might become part of a Jewish esthetic.

Schwartzschild again called attention to contemporary art. Mobiles, "events," written artistic invitations to action can all be seen as linked to the idea of ma'aseh, deed, and serve as challenges to act, to transform this world. In a sense, modern art seeks that which appears unattainable but must be sought.

I also want to echo Schwartzschild's bold and shocking claim that the Nazis may have had an inkling of all this when they identified modern art with what they saw as degenerate Judaism. For Jewish art generally does not seek to depict the natural world. Moreover, in contrast to mimesis, Jewish art challenges the human to act and to imitate God through the deed.

Rachel Wischnitzer, in her ground-breaking essay, New Art and We, argued that the Jewish divorce from naturalism led to a concern with "the inner face, the inside of things."

Contemporary thinkers, such as Emmanuel Levinas, see in Judaism the polar opposite of the Nazi effort at dehumanization. For Levinas, we are commanded to see the true visage, the face of other people, even the stranger, and to act with moral courage on behalf of the Other.

One can see in contemporary art a similar struggle against and for ethics. One can sense an envisioning of the unattainable, comparable to the Jewish struggle to realize the messiah. We should note a difference between contemporary esthetics and a Jewish esthetic. I think of some recent exhibits which trash religious symbols of Christians when I caution that in its quest for freedom, sometimes modern art actually degrades the spirit. Jewish art, in contrast, always strives for kedushah, the elevation of the human toward the holy.

In its quest for hadrat kodesh, the beauty of holiness, the ritual objects of Jewish art serve as a constant moral challenge to act so that the human being, the only true icon of God in this world, is treated with dignity and respect.

Opinions

The rhetoric of destruction

I write these lines in the midst of a new low in the Mideast conflict. It seems to me that the days of the 1970s are being relived. The media generally favour the Palestinian cause, the United Nations delivers itself of its condemnation of the Jewish state, and some religious bodies come down with similar pronouncements. We, in turn, travel to Israel on solidarity missions and express our love for our brothers and sisters.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The fact is that Ehud Barak offered peace with Palestinians so far-reaching that many Israelis were doubtful about its extent, but Yasser Arafat once again missed his chance – and Israelis and Palestinians are paying for it with blood. Moreover, when peaceful conditions eventually return, Israel will have to look at the way its Arab citizens are treated. Discrimination anywhere at any time undermines the proper functioning of democracy. In that respect, Israel is no different from Canada.

But what is different is the inflammatory rhetoric on the other side. I read today what Ahmad Abu Halabiya, a member of the Palestinian Authority and a former acting rector of the Islamic University in Gaza, said in a recent sermon aired on the television channel of the Palestinian Authority. Here are some quotations:

"O brother believers, the criminals, the terrorists are the Jews that butchered our children, orphaned them, widowed our women and desecrated our holy places and sacred sites. They are the ones who must be butchered and killed; as Allah the Almighty said, 'Fight them.' Allah will torture them at your hands, will humiliate them and will help you to overcome them, and will relieve the minds of the believers…

"Brothers in belief, Allah has purchased from the believers their persons and their property in return for the promise that they shall have paradise for their fight in the cause of Allah…

"Have no mercy on the Jews, no matter where they are, in any country, fight them wherever you are. Wherever you meet them, kill them. Wherever you are, kill those Jews and those Americans who are like them and those who stand by them. They are all in one trench against the Arabs and the Muslims because they established Israel here, in the beating heart of the Arab world in Palestine."

That is the nub of the matter. The speaker's view – one that is inculcated in Arab children from the moment they are old enough to read – is that Israel is an intruder and has no right to exist. Nothing has changed in the minds of those who repeat this view endlessly.

Not all Arabs and/or Muslims think that way, but once again this has become an acceptable rhetoric, and as long as it continues, the words of peace will be inaudible. It has once more become a battle, not just against Israel, but against all Jews.

But then, this was the way it was 30 years ago and Israel survived it, as did we. I am confident we will do it again.

An uneven balance sheet

In the surfeit of analysis that is inevitable in a crisis, there is a facile tendency for certain truisms to take hold. In Israel today, these are the "I told you so" tendency of the old right and the chagrin and silencing of the old left. How, people ask, can there be peace now? But the rhetoric of this outdated divide masks a more complex reality for Israelis internally, as well as in their relations with their neighbours. History does not stand still, and the Middle East universe is different than it was 10 years ago.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

In fact, at no time in the history of the Arab-Israeli conflict has peace seemed so close and yet so far, at one and the same time. Although the peace process is clearly stalled, and Yasser Arafat's fatal weaknesses as a negotiating partner have been exposed, certain achievements of the Oslo process cannot be erased. The reality of the conflict, even between Israelis and Palestinians, has been altered immeasurably. What is the balance sheet to date?

Since the signing of the Wye agreement by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in 1998, a consensus has emerged for most Israelis on the reality of Palestinian nationhood and statehood, as well as an acceptance of the principle of territorial withdrawal from significant parts of the West Bank and Gaza.

As recent polls have shown, this is unlikely to change. A majority of Israelis have maintained support for renewed negotiations with the Palestinians, right through the violence of the last several weeks. On the Arab side, the restrained resolutions at the Arab League Summit last month demonstrated the realism of Arab leaders who know that the risks of war by far outweigh the gains of strident rhetoric. In spite of the ongoing conflict with the Palestinians, Israel does not face the prospect of all-out war. So much for the assets.

The liabilities are all too clear. The outbreak of violence has forced a fundamental rethinking of the assumptions that guided the Israeli peace camp for three decades. Arafat's refusal to accept Barak's offer of 90 percent of the territories captured in 1967 gives the lie to the belief that withdrawal from those territories, as such, is the key to peace with the Palestinians. The sinking realization for supporters of the process is that the conflict may not have resolution in the foreseeable future. Coupled with the zealous fervour of religious rhetoric that has been woven into recent events, the future seems angry, confrontational and explosive.

Inside Israel– and this no less important – recent violence on the part of Israeli Palestinians has reopened the festering sore of relations between the Jewish majority and the Arab minority. The dilemma of coexistence is acute. For many Jewish Israelis, it now appears that the "Green Line" has disappeared. Israeli Arabs are identified with the Palestinians, and their loyalty is questioned more than ever before.

For Israeli Arabs, the death of 16 fellow Arabs at the hands of Israeli police has been the violent culmination of decades of discrimination and secondary status. From their perspective, Israelis never dealt with their reality as a minority with equal status within a Jewish state. While radical voices within the Arab community are calling openly for a disengagement from the state, others in the Arab and Jewish community feel that this may be a last chance for a renewed dialogue and a new effort at equalizing opportunities and resources. No Israeli prime minister can now afford to ignore this issue, regardless of the outcome with the Palestinians.

Last week, the excruciating existential dilemmas faced by Israel were expressed eloquently and forcefully in an address to law graduates by Chief Justice Aharon Barak. "When the guns of war fire," he said, "we need the 'muse' more than ever. Especially when the guns fire, we must strengthen our internal democracy and our respect for the equality of every individual in our society, including 'the stranger in our midst.'"

Ultimately, this is what Israelis are fighting for. As the relationship with the Palestinians is radicalized and an angry generation of Israel Arabs goes to the streets, the country has to redefine, again, what it means to be a democracy at war.

Do we need the kosher police?

Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir, the organization that supervises kashrut, has recently published formal rules concerning the practice of keeping kosher.

In the spirit of Quebec's beloved language police, l'Office de la Langue Française, the Vaad seeks to intervene more directly in all phases of Jewish eating, from food preparation to consumption. In so doing, the Vaad runs the risk of becoming the de facto "kosher police" of Montreal Jewry.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

According to the Vaad's executive director, who arrived in Montreal from South Africa two years ago, the aim is to protect the consumer. One logical way to do that would be to simply refuse to endorse the kashrut of any Jewish venue that does not meet the Vaad's standards. (The fact that for most Jews, keeping kosher is a matter of idiosyncratic degree, not of absolutes, does not undermine the Vaad's role in setting up a standard. The issue is how the standard is applied.)

The method of approving Jewish establishments has been the rough status quo for many years. Certainly, synagogues and Jewish venues differ in their level of kashrut. Jewish consumers can decide where to eat in the same way they decide whether a given restaurant is really kosher, relying on certification by the Vaad Ha'ir. But this apparently is insufficient.

As a result the Vaad is targeting Jewish caterers. Vaad-certified caterers would apparently no longer be able to provide kosher food for simchahs taking place in unapproved venues. According to the report in The CJN (Oct. 19), kosher caterers would be forbidden to service clients in Reform and Reconstructionist (my own) synagogues under any circumstances. This is an indirect attack on the very legitimacy of these denominations. (And what is worse, the attack is directed at the weak spot of all Jews, their stomach.)

One assumes, one has to assume, that this is a well-meaning initiative by the Vaad and not deliberately mean-spirited. But it seems that the cure, as reported so far, may be far worse than the alleged disease. The policy even envisions the Vaad sending mashgichim into private homes, especially when catering staff are being used for an event. Even Quebec's language police have so far resisted the incursion into private homes, though they may take inspiration from the Vaad's guidelines.

It seems that this policy might lead to many losers and few winners. Jews who are not strictly Orthodox will be less likely and able to hold kosher events, in synagogues or in their own homes. (Will kosher butchers who sell meat to secular Jews or non-Jews be targeted next?) Kosher caterers may well see their businesses hurt, with fewer affairs to service. Non-kosher caterers will pick up the slack.

It seems likely that the cost of kosher food may also rise. The Vaad intends to hire more mashgichim, who will be working longer hours at Jewish official and private affairs. All caterers and synagogues will have to fill out more paperwork to meet the new requirements. At the end of the day, directly or indirectly, it is the consumers who will wind up paying these extra costs.

But there is a far greater cost than money and inconvenience. As CJN readers know, the Jewish world at present is dealing with a renewed attack on Israel's legitimacy in the Middle East. There is an accompanying increase in anti-Semitic incidents in Canada and throughout the Jewish world. The Vaad's actions are inevitably divisive, pitting Orthodox against non-Orthodox Jews. Jewish energies can be used far better for other matters. This is not the time.

And Montreal is not the place. Over the years, Jewish communities evolve with distinctive characteristics. Montreal in the recent period has been noted for the relative harmony and tolerance found among all the branches of Judaism. If I had to distill the principles which of late typify Montreal Jewish life, I would propose those of ahavat Yisrael, klal Yisrael, Yiddishkeit and mentschlichkeit.

The spirit of the Vaad's new policy has the unintended consequence of negating these values. By all means, the Vaad must continue its commendable work of maintaining high standards in the production of kosher food and encouraging Jews to experience the satisfaction of choosing kashrut. But 1984 has long gone, and there is no need for a Jewish Big Brother. Regulating the actions of consumers through enforcement of rules on kosher caterers seems unnecessary and counterproductive. As my late father, alav hashalom, would say, feh!

The Kirshner File

Israel's Frankenstein: Sheikh Ahmad Yassin

These are propitious times for Hamas – the Islamic Resistance Movement – and its smaller offshoot, Islamic Jihad. The Oslo peace process has been battered, perhaps beyond repair, the prospect of armed conflict between Israel and the Palestinian Authority is no longer theoretical, and the mood of Israelis and Palestinians has hardened.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In short, conditions are ripe for a resurgence and retrenchment of radicalism and rejectionism among the Palestinian masses, courted with equal fervour by the PA, Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Palestinians who have no faith in diplomacy to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict, who believe that Israel has no right to exist as a sovereign Jewish state, and who champion Islamic fundamentalism as a possible panacea for the Palestinians' plight as a dispossessed and stateless people look mainly to Hamas, founded and guided by Sheik Ahmad Yassin, for inspiration.

Hamas, having always contemptuously scorned the peace process as a waste of time, has turned increasingly bolder as the new Palestinian uprising has taken hold in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Its political leader, a Gaza University professor named Ismael Abu Shanab, said recently that since the Palestinians are at war with Israel and since they seek vengeance for the killing of scores of Palestinians by Israeli forces, "all Israeli targets are legitimate."

This raises the distinct and horrific possibility that Hamas, backed by Iran and Syria, among others, is preparing to launch a new round of suicide bombings, the last deadly wave of which convulsed Israel from April 1994 to September 1997 and claimed the lives of some 60 people. Alluding to this, Prime Minister Ehud Barak, on Oct. 12, warned, "I call on the public to be vigilant."

It was, in retrospect, a prescient warning. Last week, shortly after PA President Yasser Arafat and Minister of Regional Development Shimon Peres negotiated a shaky truce based on the unimplemented Sharm al-Sheik accord, Islamic Jihad struck, setting off a car bomb in Jerusalem. The blast came on the heels of another suicide bombing perpetrated by Islamic Jihad on Oct. 26. Riding a bicycle near an Israeli army post in Gaza, the terrorist detonated five kilograms of explosives strapped to his stomach and lightly wounded two soldiers. The attack, though timed to mark the fifth anniversary of the assassination of Islamic Jihad leader Fathi Shakaki in Malta, was a foretaste of what Palestinian radicals have in store for the foreseeable future.

The Israeli government blamed the PA for both Islamic Jihad bombings, claiming that its leaders have deliberately encouraged violence since Ariel Sharon's ill-fated visit to the Temple Mount. The PA denied the accusation, saying it had no vested interest in such acts.

In the past month, however, Arafat authorized the release of dozens of Palestinian militants from prisons. They included Mahmud Rejab Zatma and Adnan Jaber Alghul, master bombmakers affiliated with Hamas whose devices killed numerous Israelis in Jerusalem, and Hashem al-Malek Deeb, who drove an Islamic Jihad terrorist to Tel Aviv for a suicide bombing mission.

Arafat, too, allowed Hamas and Islamic Jihad officials to sit on the steering committees that planned street protests, and looked the other way when their supporters desecrated Joseph's Tomb in Nablus.

Prior to the latest unrest, the PA kept Hamas and Islamic Jihad on a fairly short lease. Bowing to Israeli and U.S. demands, Arafat arrested key Hamas members and foiled their plans.

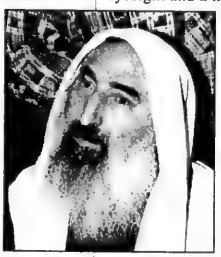
Last May, the PA detained Mohammed Deif, chief of Hamas' armed wing, the Izzedine al-Kassam Brigades. A fugitive for four years, Deif was a top associate of Yehiya Ayyash, popularly known as The Engineer. Ayyash masterminded the first wave of suicide attacks in Afula and Hadera, among other places, after Baruch Goldstein's murderous rampage in Hebron in February 1994. A settler from Kiryat Arba, Goldstein mowed down 29 Arabs at prayer in a mosque.

In 1995, Ayyash's booby-trapped cell phone exploded in his face. His assassination is believed to have been the work of Israel's secret service. Mounting a campaign of revenge, Deif – who still remains in a PA jail – was behind a series of suicide bombings in a nine-day period from February to March 1996.

Coming under intense Israeli and American pressure, Arafat incarcerated Hamas activists (some of whom were later freed in what critics refer to as his "revolving-door" policy), raided its bomb factories, largely dismantled its network of clinics and schools, and seized control of its mosques.

From an operational point, these raids virtually crippled Hamas. Yassin, in an interview last August, acknowledged that the PA, in keeping with its security co-operation obligations under the Oslo accords, had nipped in the bud 175 operations.

By the same token, Arafat turned a blind eye to Hamas terrorism. In 1997, after suspending bilateral negotiations with Israel over Benjamin Netanyahu's decision to build the Har Choma housing project in eastern Jerusalem, Arafat tolerated and may have encouraged a fresh suicide bombing campaign by Hamas: In March, a bomber struck a Tel Aviv cafe, killing three women, one of whom was pregnant. In July, 16 shoppers were killed when two bombers blew themselves up at the Mahane Yehuda market in Jerusalem. And in September, three bombers took the lives of five Israelis in Jerusalem's Ben-Yehuda Street pedestrian mall.



Sheikh Ahmad Yassin

Hamas, however, has had its share of failures, thanks in part to Israel's vigilance. In 1998, the Shin Bet – Israel's internal security service – frustrated some 100 planned Hamas attacks aimed, at among other targets, a shopping mall in Jerusalem, the diamond exchange in Ramat Gan, and bypass roads in the West Bank. Shin Bet also tracked down and eliminated two of Hamas' most wanted operatives, Imad and Adel Awadallah.

Last year, Israeli commandos hunted down Eiad Batat, a Hamas mastermind, while the Shin Bet squelched Hamas operations in Hadera, Tiberias and Haifa. In the past seven months, Israel has thwarted a bombing in a Netanya bus station, wiped out a terrorist squad in the Israeli Arab village of Taibe, and almost captured Mahmud Abu Hanud, a leading Hamas fugitive. During an Israeli raid on his West Bank village, Hanud, wounded, escaped the dragnet. Subsequently, he surrendered to the PA, and remains in its custody.

Apart from these setbacks, Hamas' operational abilities have been damaged by Jordan. In November 1999, King Abdullah II, charging Hamas with illegal political activities, closed its office in Amman and deported three of its leaders. One of them, Khaled Meshal, was the object of a bungled Mossad assassination attempt in Amman in 1997. Strangely enough, the Jordanian government did not touch Mousa Abu Marzook, suspected of complicity in 10 terrorist attacks from 1990 to 1994. A U.S. resident for 15 years, he was deported to Jordan by the United States after Israel suddenly withdrew its extradition request.

Yassin, Hamas' spiritual leader, is a free man today because of the Meshal affair, which badly strained Israel's relations with Jordan. After Jordan arrested the Mossad agents who tried to kill Meshal, King Hussein, outraged by Israel's operation on Jordanian soil, demanded Yassin's release from an Israeli jail in return for their freedom.

A quadriplegic with poor hearing, failing eyesight and a tinny voice, Yassin is Israel's Frankenstein. In 1973, Israel granted Yassin, born in Palestine in 1936, a licence to establish an Islamic centre as a charity to run social, religious and welfare institutions. From 1979 to 1984, Israel propped up Yassin, a preacher, as a counterweight to the secular PLO. In 1984, he was jailed for possession of firearms and sentenced to 13 years' imprisonment. Released in 1985 in a prisoner exchange between Israel and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, Yassin resumed his anti-Israel activities.

He formed Hamas in January 1988, following the outbreak of the intifadah a month earlier. In August 1988, Hamas issued its charter, which opposes the very idea of a Jewish state in the region. Yassin was rearrested in 1989, charged with conspiring to abduct and murder two Israeli soldiers. He was sentenced to 15 years.

The leadership of Hamas passed to a disciple, Abdel al-Aziz Rantisi. Along with 400 supporters, he was deported to southern Lebanon in December 1992, accused of abducting and murdering an Israeli border policeman. Since Yassin's return to the fold, he has twice offered Israel a ceasefire in exchange for a complete withdrawal from the West Bank, Gaza and eastern Jerusalem. But Yassin's long-range strategic objective – Israel's destruction – has not changed, and he fully intends to fight Israel until his last drop of blood.

The journeys of a lifetime

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As the Torah introduces us to our ancestors, it begins to describe a journey that will unfold over a length of time. The lech lecha journey that Abraham and Sarah and their household take raises questions about the nature of such a journey.

God tells Abraham to travel to a land, sight unseen. With nothing offered but the promise of a future, God tells Abraham to leave all he knows behind and journey into the unknown.

Immediately we see the beginnings of something that is more than a physical trek. Abraham and his family must leave behind their homeland, their ancestral home and their birthplace.

These are not locations, these are relationships. The invitation is to travel on a life journey.

The Hebrew phrase used by God to begin the journey is lech lecha. The first word, lech is the imperative verb of the word walk or go.

That word alone would have been sufficient to communicate the message. God is telling Abraham to go – lech.

This raises the interesting question of the need for the second word, which is actually quite awkward grammatically both in Hebrew and English. The word lecha can have several different meanings. It can mean for you and to you. Jewish commentaries have discussed this word at great length and the meaning of its inclusion in a phrase that was clear without it.

One of the most common understandings of the phrase is that the word lecha shows that the journey itself will benefit Abraham. The process of the journey itself will improve him, or perhaps the rewards at the end are so great that it is a journey he takes for himself.

This interpretation understands the journey to be quite physical with the arrival representing the moment of climax. But there are other meanings that shift the focus of the journey.

Since lecha also means to you, it now adds another dimension to the arrival. The implication is that Abraham will journey toward himself. It is a journey of self-discovery where he learns who he is and who he is capable of becoming. But he is taking this trip blindly – he does not know where he is going. God is leading the way and Abraham is following behind. And we hear determination in God's words.

God does not ask Abraham to embark on the trip but God uses the imperative form: "Go." In fact, some early translations render God's words as "Get out!" Why has God chosen such strong language?

The midrash in Genesis Rabbah asks why the Torah lists all the generations by name until Abraham? Surely the text could simply have told us there were 10 generations between Adam and Noah and 10 generations between Noah and Abraham. Why list their names?

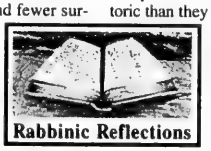
The rabbis conclude that the list is to show the reader how long God has waited for this moment. The word lecha (for you), is God saying to Abraham, "I have waited so long for you," and therefore God's words are strong and determined.

Abraham and Sarah are our Jewish ancestors and we all walk in their footsteps. We all take life journeys and they are journeys of discovery and journeys of arrival. The Torah now tells us that we can choose to take that journey alone or with the Divine Creator and God waits patiently until we make our choice.

A megillah for Yom Hashoah

By RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM

Loss of memory is scary whenever and to whomever it occurs. But to Jews, in particular to Jews of our times, it is terrifying. We have a great deal to remember, including memories that the rest of the world would rather see forgotten. We fear for ourselves when we realize that each year means fewer and fewer survivors left to remind us and the world of what happened, of what human beings are capable of doing to each other. We fear for the millions who will be wiped out of all earthly record, if not for our determined effort to ensure that they are remembered and revered until the end of time.



A generation from now, there will be no more Holocaust survivors among us to testify to what happened to them, to us. We need to hear that testimony now. It is a sacred responsibility.

We know that the memories carried from one generation to the next are imperfect at best. They are a mere echo of the events, times, feelings and conditions described. All the more reason for us to listen as well as we can to the witnesses of events that preceded us, for in the next generation, it is we who become witnesses to the witnesses. It is our testimony, one, two or 10 generations removed from actual events, that will help set the tone of the Jewish future.

The recently concluded Sukkot festival commemorates our ancient wilderness wanderings following the Exodus from Egypt, which itself is remembered through the Pesach festival six months from now. Shavuot will remind us of the Sinai revelation of Torah. Minor holidays of Chanukah and Purim will commemorate the Hasmonean victory over the Hellenist assimilationists and the Greek-Syrian Empire, and our being saved from evil intent in ancient Persia. Fast days on our calendar will remind us of the various stages in the destruction of the ancient Temple. Our holidays are far more historic than they are theological. Remembering is fundamental to our very being as Jews.

Remembering the Holocaust, though, has been challenging on a religious level. It is relatively so soon after the events, that we have not yet even come close to uniformity as a people in figuring out how to put our memorializing the six million into a religious context.

But we can't wait a thousand years – about as long as it took the commemoration of the exodus to evolve into the seder of Pesach. We don't have the luxury of time that our ancestors did. First, the tragedy of the Holocaust dwarfs all previous periods of suffering in intensity – there simply is no comparison; what was good enough for the enslavement in Egypt and the liberation cannot suffice for the horrors of Auschwitz and Treblinka. Second, our enemies, in particular the adversaries of Israel, the Arab world and some anti-Semites closer to home, seek to deny our pain, to eradicate our memories, and the risk is always there that their sympathetic audience will continue to grow.

No, we can't wait. We have to memorialize the Holocaust in our liturgical year.

Yom Hashoah was established by the Knesset decades ago, but it has been more secular than religious in nature. Some communities have sought to establish a ritual, but these attempts have been sporadic.

Several years back, Alex Eisen, known for his charitable projects in the Toronto community and the State of Israel, raised the idea of producing a megillah, a Hebrew scroll, to be read on Yom Hashoah. He felt, correctly, that a consistent approach was needed in synagogues, that a megillah, to be chanted in synagogue on Yom Hashoah, would give the rituals in our shuls a central structure, and lead to the day being observed by more and more Jews, as, of course, it should be.

We have now begun the process of creating a megillah for Yom Hashoah. The text we are writing, of course, is not a "megillah" in the biblical sense, for none of us have the temerity to suggest that we could add to the Tanach.

Rather, it will fill the liturgical function of a megillah on Yom Hashoah.

Even though no blessings will be recited by virtue of it not being a biblical text, it will serve as the central core of a liturgy for that important day. Even though the text is being produced through the Rabbinical Assembly and Schechter Institute of the Conservative Movement, the hope is that others across the religious spectrum will find meaning and inspiration in the final product. The text, being written in Israel, should, God willing, be completed by this coming Yom Hashoah.

A way to remember the six million needs to be brought into the synagogue in a structured and consistent manner. Time is not on our side. Hopefully, the megillah we are producing will help further that goal.

Israel radio on the net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

With the news from Israel changing from day to day and hour to hour, it can be hard to keep up with the latest events. But thanks to Internet technology, you can listen to the exact news that Israelis are listening to. Today, I'm going to begin my guide to the sites that let you listen to both pre-recorded and live Israeli radio shows on your computer.

First, though, a few important notes about software setup, reliability, sound quality and cost.

Software and setup: Setting up your computer to receive these stations is relatively easy.

The majority of the radio sites in Israel (and around the world) make use of either the Real program [http://www.real.com/player/] or Windows Media Player [http://windowsmedia.com/redir/download]. Both programs are free although Real does sell an upgraded version which offers a few more bells and whistles. I have only used the free version of Real and have been very satisfied with it. These programs work with Netscape and Internet Explorer and have versions for Windows and Macintosh. Your computer may already have these programs installed on it but it can't hurt to upgrade to the latest version available online.

Reliability: Install the software, click on the button – and sometimes you'll hear nothing at all. Although the reliability of Israeli radio stations has improved markedly over the past two years, be prepared to receive error messages telling you that no signal is currently available. That could either mean that the station is off the air permanently or more likely, that you should try again in a few hours or in a day or two.

Quality of sound: The quality of the sound depends on a few factors, some of which you have control over, some of which you do not – the quality of the signal the originating radio station is sending out; the speed of your Internet connection; and the speed of your computer and whether you use external speakers. I have found that with a 56k modem telephone connection and an internal speaker, the stations usually sound comparable to an AM radio station.

Cost of the service: Although there are some radio stations that require you to pay to listen, the vast majority of sites in Israel (and around the world) are free. There is so much out there, I have never been tempted to pay for anything more.

You can start listening to Israel in English twice a day [http://www.israelradio.org/english.html]. Every morning, Kol Israel (The Voice of Israel) public radio produces a 15-minute news bulletin including a review of the morning's Israeli newspapers and every evening there's a half-hour news magazine.

If you want to listen to something other than Hebrew or English, then you can tune into Israel's shortwave service – right on your computer.

Israel Radio International carries daily broadcasts in Russian, French, Amharic and Tigre, Persian, Spanish and Ladino, Yiddish, Romanian and Hungarian [http://www.israelradio.org/livestream.htm]. Since these aren't recorded shows, you'll have to catch them live as they are being broadcast. The IRI page carries a complete schedule to help you out.

One of my favourite Israeli stations is Reshet Bet – Israel Radio's news and information station [http://bet.iba.org.il/]. The Hebrew-language station focuses its coverage on extended newscasts and interviews. The site's home page has links to the station's broadcast schedules, photos of their studios and the station's live radio site [http://bet.iba.org.il/reshetbet.rm]. I often like to start it up and just let it play in the background as I'm doing my work.

And even if you don't understand Hebrew, I do recommend listening to Reshet Bet anyway. Just close your eyes, listen to the five beeps leading up to the hourly news and pretty soon you'll imagine yourself riding Dan Bus No. 2 up Tel Aviv's Dizengoff Street.

Next time, more radio from Israel.

Vacation for one

By DOUG HOHENER

Go on a holiday. You might meet someone. Sound familiar? Well it might if you're like me, single, in your early 30s, and wanting to go on a vacation. Such was the case again this year as I embarked on my summer vacation.

Let's get something straight: Vacationing is stressful enough, but add to the mix what I refer to as the "single factor" and you've got stress.

Everyone encouraged me to go. In addition to the "maybe you'll meet someone" I was also told – "Go, you'll make new friends."

I don't know about you, but making friends on the Let's go Israel trip or the Let's go Europe trip was possible when I was younger because everyone was single and ready to have fun.

But my experience tells me that you don't actually meet all that many people (people = single men and women) when you're travelling alone in your early 30s.

In fact, what I mostly meet is couples, which is great if you're craving more of that third wheel feeling – like the one you get at home when you go out with your married friends.

But I wasn't going to stay home on my vacation. I wanted to go away. Well, what I really wanted and had hoped for was that this would be the summer I would go on vacation with that "special" someone. However, it was not in the cards. So I found myself looking vacation time straight in the face and deciding to take the plunge into yet another vacation for one.

When you're single, the first thing you think about is maybe trying one of those Club Med things. Everyone says how great they are. But they often go places I'm really not interested in going to, and although I do entertain the idea because, let's face it, there definitely will be other "single" people on the trip, I just can't seem to sacrifice what I really want to do for the sake of being in the company of strangers who are either hoping to meet someone or wishing they were on the vacation they really wanted.

Instead, I opted for what I really wanted – a whale-watching trip, and I picked up a travel brochure, one where they picture romantic get-aways – sea, beach, candlelight and two people staring into each other's eyes.

Then there are the travel agents who, upon realizing you're not a "big ticket item" (i.e. you're single), don't spend too much time helping you.

Finally, I bought a single plane ticket to my chosen destination.

The plane trip was fine until I realized that it was going to cost me double the cab fare, double the food costs, double the room rates, double everything, except myself of course.

Finally I arrive. Now I need to book a room – a single room, as the hotel reservation person asks me again, "You want a single room?" "Yes," I reply, "that's right, a single room."

Finally, I fall asleep. In the morning I set off on my excursions, ordering a ticket for one on my boat trips. Boat trips that include five other couples and me.

Later, once my knapsack full of nosh has run out, it's time to face the dreaded dinner for one. As I am seated at the table for four, I hope the waiter doesn't take away all of the place-mats, but after confirming that I am indeed alone, he proceeds to take them away – a table for four with one person at it – now if that isn't obvious.

Luckily, I have planned ahead and brought plenty of magazines to read over dinner. I even took along my journal so that I would feel like I was actually having a conversation. Once dinner is over, I head back to my hotel for yet another night of planning, while I work on singing skills to try to drown out the giggles coming from the room beside me. And so it goes on, for a week.

Will I put myself through all of this next year? Will I continue to go on vacation alone, dine alone, read magazines at restaurants, book my one-person ticket to singlesville? The answer is, of course, yes. I mean, you never know, I might meet someone.

Jewish issues in Atlantic Canada

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Lack of Jewish immigration to Atlantic Canada is an issue candidates for seats in the Nov. 27 federal election should be considering, say two high-ranking Jewish officials in the region.

"We'd like to see Canadian consulates encourage Jewish immigration to Canada, and specifically to our region," says Boris Tzinman, chair of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), Atlantic region.

The Halifax businessman was encouraged to come to the city almost 20 years ago by a Canadian embassy employee in Russia.

"Members of Parliament in Ottawa can have incredible input in this issue," he says.

Jewish populations in smaller centres are dwindling and can be bolstered by new immigrants, says Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council.

"These immigrants are encouraged to go to bigger centres where the major populations and Jewish institutions are located," he says. "If the federal government could steer these people away from the gridlock and to our more open region, we could build our communities."

While Tzinman admits jobs are not plentiful in the region, he says the government doesn't make things easier for potential newcomers.

"Atlantic Canada has an increasing computer-oriented economy, and is heavy into oil and gas," he says.

"JIAS is trying to provide job information to immigrants. MPs and the federal government should be encouraging people by providing these mechanisms through their embassies."

Goldberg says Jewish voters should be asking their candidates to help provide funding for more Jewish cultural events in Atlantic Canada by bringing in Jewish artists from around the world.

"In addition, if we can elect a government member from Nova Scotia, it might give us more of a voice in cabinet and Parliament. Right now, there is no one doing direct lobbying for Jewish Nova Scotians."

He says Canada's recent support for a United Nations resolution that condemned Israel was not widely accepted in the Jewish community.

"We had conversations with [Halifax MP and federal NDP leader] Alexa McDonough, but were given political talk which meant nothing," he claims.

"We also sent statements of displeasure to all Liberal MPs."

He says candidates have to be aware of the feelings of Jewish Atlantic Canadians, and all Canadian Jews, before voting on certain issues.

At press time, there were no known Jewish candidates in the region.

Little change expected in Manitoba seats

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Manitoba's federal electoral map should be little changed after Nov. 27 and the province is expected to remain the most politically diverse in Canada.

Manitoba is the only province with representatives of all four major political parties and one independent.

The current breakdown of MPs from the province is – five Liberals, four NDP members, three from the Canadian Alliance, one elected as a Reform member but who now sits as an independent, and a lone Progressive Conservative.

Winnipeg accounts for half of Manitoba's 14 federal ridings and is split between the Liberals and the NDP. The city remains hostile territory for the Canadian Alliance.

In the northwestern area of the city, home to one of two suburbs with large Jewish populations, three-term Liberal MP Rey Pagtakhan is expected to be re-elected.

NDP MP Judy Wasylycia-Leis, in the riding next door, should also be safe.

The Liberals believe they may have a shot at the NDP-held riding of Winnipeg North Centre, which they lost in the last election.

The most interesting contest will be in former foreign affairs minister Lloyd Axworthy's riding of Winnipeg South Centre, which also has a large Jewish population. Axworthy, who has held the seat since 1980, is not seeking re-election.

Carrying the Liberal banner in the riding this time is Anita Neville. A long time school trustee, Neville is the only Jewish candidate running for federal office in Manitoba this time.

Newman lost his seat in the last provincial vote in 1999, which brought the NDP to power.

UN resolution support angers Willowdale voters

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A lot of concern has been expressed by Willowdale residents about Canada's support of the recent UN resolution criticizing Israel, said Liberal Jim Peterson, 59, MP for the riding.

Peterson, a lawyer, told The CJN that as secretary of state he must observe cabinet solidarity and will not speak out against Canada's vote, but he has passed along the concerns to John Manley, the new minister of external affairs.

Jim Peterson

"Manley has not changed Canada's foreign policy, which is to ensure peace on both sides, and that Israel, the only democracy in the Middle East, has the right to exist behind secure borders," Peterson said.

Yvonne Bobb

The riding, which is generally bordered by Highway 401, Steeles Avenue, Bathurst Street and Victoria Park Avenue has 70,989 voters.

Peterson, who has won the riding four times since 1979, estimates that under 10 percent of the voters are Jewish.

On funding for Jewish day schools, he said the federal government already allows a tax credit for the religious portion of the fees.

Chungsen Leung

However, he said that he believes that parents should get tax credits for the rest.

"Ontario collects school taxes from these parents and gives them back nothing in return," he said.

Peterson said he intends to press home this view as soon as he can arrange a meeting with the prime minister.

These issues loom large with the Alliance party candidate, Kevyn Nightingale, who said his campaign chair is Norm Gardner, former chair of the police services board.

Kevyn Nightingale

Nightingale, a tax accountant, subscribes wholeheartedly to the views of his party leader, Stockwell Day, that it was wrong for Canada to support the UN resolution criticizing Israel for events in the Middle East.

He also endorses Day's stand that people sending their children to private schools should get a tax credit "for taking the burden off the public school system."

Though his party has no official position on war criminals, he told The CJN that he and the party believe that no war criminals, including those with Nazi connections, should be allowed to stay in Canada.

The Progressive Conservative candidate in the riding is Chungsen Leung, 50, is a native of Taiwan who came to Canada in 1968.

Leung said he believes Israel's right to defend itself is comparable to Taiwan's struggle for independence.

"I don't think Canada should have supported the United Nations resolution against Israel," he said. "Israel has every right to take steps to defend itself."

"I've been an entrepreneur for 25 years," said the candidate who is a proprietor of a sporting goods store.

"Canada has been dragging its feet on the prosecution of war criminals," Leung said.

On the question of government support for religious schools, he said he believed that if there is public funding for the Catholic schools, it should be extended to other religions "so that everyone is treated fairly."

As members of the Newtonbrook United Church, Leung said he and his wife take part in a Passover seder at Beth Sholom synagogue every year.

Born in Guyana, NDP candidate Yvonne Bobb came to Canada in 1969. In Guyana she was involved with the People's Progressive Party under Dr. Cheddi Jagan.

Asked by The CJN what her view is of the UN resolution criticizing Israel, Bobb said: "I don't have any comment on that."

As for funding for Jewish schools, Bobb said she believes the public school system should be available to everyone, no matter what ethnic community they come from.

On Canada's record on war criminals, she said: "My personal opinion is that if any have committed crimes and are going free, they should be punished."

A provincial civil servant, on leave of absence without pay, Bobb has held several elected positions in her OPSEU local.

She believes the two most important issues in this election are health care and the environment.

"I am working for people of colour, workers, particularly women, and all those who suffer exploitation, sexism and racism," she said. "I believe in equal opportunity and economic empowerment for all Canadians."

Other issues she believes in are universal child care, equal pay for work of equal value, affirmative action and rent control.

Israel In Crisis

"כל ישראל ערבים זה בזה"

What One Family Can Do

Here are some suggestions from UJA FEDERATION's Board of Jewish Education regarding the current crisis in Israel. We are all concerned and anxious about our brothers and sisters in Israel, those of us with close relatives there and those of us who feel that we are all one family under siege. As parents, children and grandparents we need to react together and find a way to demonstrate our solidarity as a family.

- Phone and e-mail relatives and friends in Israel
- Join one of the many solidarity missions and take your family to Israel
- Write letters to school children: for addresses call BJE 416-633-7770
- Create and send "faxable" graphics to Israel to lift their spirits
- Order baskets for soldiers (Shai LeChayal) call 416-783-3053
- Make a video montage of families sharing thoughts of support
- Contact Prime Minister Chretien, your M.P.'s and M.P.P.'s and candidates in your riding; express your opinion and find out theirs
- Join other families and make a peace quilt
- Begin or end each day with a prayer for Israel
- Watch, digest, analyse and discuss the news as a family

Election 2000

Jews remain on sidelines in B.C.

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Although candidate lists are still being finalized, it appears that not one member of the B.C. Jewish community will be a nominee in the upcoming federal elections, said Zena Simces, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress's Pacific region.

"I really can't say why there's a lack of Jewish participation – and not just in the federal arena – but what Congress would like to do is hold a panel discussion and invite members of the Jewish community, leadership, and especially young people, and talk about how we can politically get more involvement," Simces said.

"I don't think we can get it going in time for the federal election but before the next provincial election we're really planning to raise the awareness and talk about getting more involved."

Simces said, however, that the CJC, the Vancouver Multicultural Society and SUCCESS – an organization of Vancouver's Chinese community members – plan to host a Vancouver candidates' forum jointly on Nov. 14. The meeting, to be held at 7:30 p.m. in the JCC's Norman Rothstein Theatre, will include Liberal, Conservative, NDP and Canadian Alliance candidates from five Vancouver ridings – Quadra, East, Centre, South and Kingsway.

"We're also planning to invite a number of MPs to a breakfast meeting and brief them on issues of concern to the Jewish community."

In particular, B.C. Jews want to hear the official party policy on Israel, and CJC wants to deal with other issues that may affect legislation and Canada's immigration policy, Simces said.

Dr. Michael Elterman, national secretary of the CJC, said a major question for Jewish voters is why Canada chose to condemn Israel in the recent UN resolution vote blaming Israel for excessive violence.

"I think what has happened, particularly in the larger cities, is that Liberal Jewish voters are beginning to ask members of Parliament and candidates what their personal and party views are on Israel. Clearly the prime minister has received thousands of messages by e-mail, letter and phone calls from the Jewish community, and I think we now have the prime minister's attention, because what he has been told is that the Liberal party cannot take for granted the Jewish vote," Elterman said.

Although Canada abstained from the UN's second vote on the violent and escalating situation within Israel, Elterman said many in the Jewish community here feel that Canada should have gone one step further to cast its vote against the resolution.

He also speculated on why B.C. Jews don't enter politics. "Perhaps our view of politics out here tends to be more cynical," Elterman said.

A letter and materials from the CJC to members of B.C.'s Jewish community are currently being written, said Erwin Nest, executive director of the CJC's Pacific region. Issues being raised in the package are not strictly B.C. matters, he added.

"There are no local [Jewish] issues, so to speak, that we will be raising for the federal election. Obviously, we would raise those for the provincial election. We're trying to activate members of the community and we'll be raising the same issues as Jews in Winnipeg, Ottawa and so on," Nest said. "Israel is obviously a big issue right now."

The package will be distributed in the CJC's constituent agencies and to all leaders in the Jewish communities, Simces said. "We're contacting leaders in the Richmond area and supplying them with this package and lists of questions to ask, and we will encourage them to meet with their local MPs."

All B.C. cities with Jewish populations, such as Kelowna and Victoria, will receive the CJC materials, Simces added.

Dr. Lawrence Rossoff, president of Richmond's Beth Tikvah synagogue, said he was not aware of any pressing issues or ongoing dialogue between his area's MPs and Richmond's Jewish population. "We share the same concerns as Jews across B.C. and across the country: Are our MPs meeting the concerns of Israel when it may not be a popular thing to do? Do they understand the nature of the conflict so a Jewish perspective is not diluted when national policy is made? And, of course, wanting to make sure our communities are safe from anti-Semitism," Rossoff said.

"There has to be zero tolerance for targeted hate."

CJC to remain neutral in federal vote: Ronen

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress will stay traditionally neutral in the countdown to the Nov. 27 federal election, president Moshe Ronen told a recent meeting of the national executive here.

But all candidates will still be made aware of Canadian Jews' solidarity with Israel, as well as its continued sense of betrayal over the Liberal government's support of the Oct. 7 United Nations Security Council resolution that condemned Israel for using "excessive" force.

"We are not going to be ambushing any government or trying to manipulate the [Jewish] electorate," Ronen said. "We are not out to defeat any government, but we will be conveying our feelings."

Ronen was joined at the meeting by Joe Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), and CJC-Quebec chair Dorothy Zalcman Howard. Most of the discussion focused on the Mideast crisis, its implications for the coming election and the unprecedented number of anti-Semitic incidents across Canada since the violence erupted.

Ronen told reporters after the meeting that Congress will not use the elections as a "tool to change government policy."

Stressing solidarity with Israel

Canadian Jewry is looking for consistent "balance" in Canadian policy. The crisis will be a "major issue" individual Jews will consider when casting their ballots, one that could "weigh heavily in their decision," he said.

At the Oct. 17 meeting between Jewish leaders and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, nobody asked for an apology for the UN vote, Ronen said. "It was pointless to ask for something [former foreign affairs minister Lloyd] Axworthy authorized."

Still, Chrétien did provide assurances that the PMO would be more directly involved before Canada votes in future Security Council resolutions.

Earlier at the meeting, Ronen said that while the sense of "disappointment and abandonment" by Canadian Jews was still being felt, it was not orchestrated by leadership but came from the grassroots.

Ronen said John Manley, Axworthy's successor as foreign affairs minister, now has the "opportunity to prove himself" with regard to Israel.

Manley, however, has said that the UN vote did not represent a change in Canada's foreign policy, and Wilder noted that Canada's UN voting pattern was indeed "not new." He referred to a February 1999 resolution supported by Canada that "described Israel in the most heinous terms.

"Canada's voting pattern was not from yesterday," Wilder said, but added that he was "appalled" by comments Axworthy had made blaming Likud leader Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount as the trigger for the violence.

Still, Wilder described the meeting with Chrétien as promising. "I think we had a good result. I thought we had a good meeting and that we had the prime minister's ear."

He advised taking a wait and see approach, to allow the Canadian government to show whether its policies on the Middle East will be more balanced.

Canada's abstention in a subsequent UN General Assembly resolution on Israel was "not the best result," Wilder said, but he noted that the resolution's content was virtually the same as the earlier one passed by the Security Council, and therefore, that the abstention was an improvement.

Mark Weintraub, national chair of CJC's community relations committee, said issues to be put before political parties as the election draws near will include dealing with reported allegations that Canada is a haven for terrorist groups that can pose a threat to the Jewish community.

There also appears to be a strong connection, he said, between international hostility to Israel and the rise of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada.

Weintraub said chants of "Death to the Jews" heard at Palestinian rallies in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal may be a "deliberate strategy" by Palestinian groups to engage Islamic fundamentalists who have not been politically oriented.

So far, he said, there has been a "troubling silence" from Canadian politicians on the upsurge in domestic anti-Semitic incidents.

Similarly, Ronen said he was disappointed that Canadian Palestinian and Arab organizations, while prepared in private to condemn some of the anti-Jewish rhetoric heard at Palestinian rallies in Canada, refused to do so publicly.

The CJC executive passed a resolution expressing its solidarity with Israel, which was to be relayed to the Prime Minister's Office.

But Congress rejected formulating another resolution denouncing the Liberal government for its Security Council vote. Ronen said the focus has to be on "moving forward," and Wilder said such a motion right now would be "unhelpful and contrary to our interests."

Meanwhile, the CIC is preparing an Election Readiness Kit, and Congress is putting together its own election guide that would put Israel at or near the top of the agenda in meetings with political parties and candidates.

Congress executive vice-president Jack Silverstone, however, cautioned that there are other important issues on the Jewish agenda, such as Nazi war criminals, restitution for Holocaust survivors, a proposed Holocaust museum and refugees.

"We cannot neglect these issues," he said.

Diabetes affects over 1.9 million people in Canada and that number is growing rapidly. By the year 2016 an estimated 2.7 million people will have diabetes. Unfortunately, diabetes remains the leading cause of end stage kidney disease requiring dialysis or transplantation, blindness in adults, non-traumatic amputation, and is a major risk factor for cardiovascular disease.

In recognition of this major health problem, Sam and Judy Pencer, long-time supporters of Mount Sinai Hospital, have generously provided financial support to create the Sam and Judy Pencer Chair in Diabetes Research.

Mount Sinai Hospital is delighted to announce that Dr. Bernard Zinman has been appointed as the inaugural Chair. Dr. Zinman is Head of the Division of Endocrinology at Mount Sinai Hospital and the University Health Network, Senior Scientist at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, Professor of Medicine at the University of Toronto, and Director of the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes. He is Chair of the Diabetes Council of Canada and is internationally known for his research accomplishments in diabetes.

The question of strategic voting

The substance of the issue aside, the recent tension between the Jewish community and the Liberal government raise some interesting questions about the so-called tactic of "strategic voting."

Strategic voting comes in two forms.

The first is "negative" in nature, as when someone votes for a candidate other than one's first choice, to prevent a third candidate from winning. An example would be to consolidate the Tory and Alliance vote into one bloc in the event of a close three-way race, to ensure a loss for the Liberal candidate.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

The second example is "positive" in nature. A voter supports a candidate because that candidate offers something specific that outweighs the voter's other general considerations, as when a voter supports the party likely to form the government, even if that party's candidate is not necessarily the best of the candidates in the riding.

Although I am not suggesting that Jews are a monolithic group, interest groups like the Jewish community, have to be careful about how they manifest strategic voting tendencies. Consider the case of the incumbent MP with a proven track record of support for Jewish community agenda issues. Should that MP pay the electoral price because of voters' frustration or anger with the MP's party? What is the extent of "the community's" responsibility, if any, to support the incumbent?

At the end of the decision, it all comes down to one word: loyalty. What goes around, comes around. Curiously, that cliche is both a promise and a threat.

If an MP has been a loyal friend in good times as well as bad, he or she deserves to see evidence of that same quality from constituents. If an MP has conscientiously tried to convey and champion the views and concerns of his constituents, he or she deserves that kind of support in return.

Loyalty ought to engender loyalty. It is the only moral response and the only sustainable political one, because of course, the converse is also true.

Governments blasted for non-compliance with UN

Two existing groups will be folded into the OAJDS: the 16-year-old Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education, an arm of Congress; and the Ontario Alliance of Jewish Schools, set up about a year ago by parents of children in day schools.

Yisroel Janowski, who chaired the new group's steering committee, called its formation "historic. It's the first time schools of all different ideologies will be at the same table."

At last week's march, the Canadian Alliance's support of federal tax breaks for parents of children in religious schools was noted by organizers. In fact, three Alliance candidates, all Jewish, were front and centre at the rally: Kevin Nightingale, who is running in Willowdale; Robert Goldin, the hopeful in Thornhill; and Jeffrey Dorfman, the candidate in York Centre.

Goldin told The CJN that the current tax structure allows for a credit of only 29 percent of tuition fees in religious schools. He said the Alliance would seek a credit that will equal $6,250 a year, the same amount Queen's Park spends per Catholic pupil. "We just want equality with Catholics," he said.

Also present was Arieh Waldman, the Toronto parent who took the case to the UN, and his lawyer, Prof. Anne Bayefsky.

Bayefsky told the crowd, which marched from a federal government building to the provincial education ministry, that the continued non-compliance by both levels of government with the UN finding is "a political farce."

She said Ontario "has failed in its moral and legal obligations" to abide by the decision, while the federal government could act, either through tax incentives or other measures that would be in keeping with the social union agreement between Ottawa and the provinces.

Funding is a big election issue in ridings with large multicultural and multi-faith populations, she said.

The rally was organized by Ontario Parents for Equality in Education Funding (OPEEF), Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF), Congress, B'nai Brith, the Vaad Harabanim on Toronto and several faith groups.

Theresienstadt captured in stark photo exhibit

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To David Steinberg, the Theresienstadt concentration camp evokes a paradoxical reaction, being a place of both darkness and of light.

In his eyes, Theresienstadt is not only a symbol of the human capacity for untrammelled evil, but also a monument to the courage of its victims and survivors.

Steinberg's photographic exhibit, Theresienstadt: The Journey Continues, opened last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation's Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum, and runs until Dec. 14.

Consisting of only 11 photographs, all of them simply composed and forlornly stark, Steinberg's exhibit is ultimately a sombre testament of courage in the face of incredible adversity.

As he tells it, a friend in Prague encouraged him to make the journey. "I saw all these photos waiting to be taken, and shared."

Using a 35mm Canon Rebel camera, Steinberg snapped some 150 images of delapidated buildings, weathered rooms and cells and decrepit doorways and windows.

In keeping with his theme, strong rays of sunlight and ominous dark shadows dominate the photographs, supplemented by Steinberg's text of Theresienstadt's history.

A place of both darkness and light

Situated on the confluence of the Elbe and Ohre rivers, Theresienstadt began its existence in the 18th century as a small fortress town called Terezin.

Composed of two star-shaped compounds referred to as the Main and Small fortresses, Terezin was transformed into a concentration camp by Nazi Germany.

Its first inmates were Czech political prisoners, but from 1941 onwards Theresienstadt became a holding pen for some 140,000 Jews from Czechoslovakia, Germany, Austria, Holland, Denmark and Hungary.

Theresienstadt was supposedly a camp for "prominent" and well-connected Jews, a "model ghetto" in German parlance. In 1944, a Red Cross delegation from Switzerland, headed by Maurice Rossel, visited Theresienstadt. In a stinging commentary on his naivete or blindness, Rossel wrote a glowing report about the camp.

In reality, it was nothing but a miserable way station to Aushwitz-Birkenau. From 1941 to 1945, upwards of 87,000 Jews were dispatched to their deaths in Poland. Only 4,000 survived.

Steinberg's photographs, which are almost benign in nature, do not convey the horror associated with Theresienstadt. But they do speak volumes about our endless capacity for evil.

Holocaust Education Week

Historians urged to pay greater attention to survivor testimony

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holocaust deniers should serve as a warning to historians, says Alain Goldschläger.

"If history is only an intellectual exercise, it may become possible to build a different version of any event," said the University of Western Ontario French professor last week at a Holocaust Education Week event.

Verifiable data and statistics alone – such as the exact number of people in cattle cars – are "not sufficient for representing the entire situation," he said. "Human suffering cannot be measured in statistics."

Speaking on Historians versus Survivors: Questioning the Testimonies, at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, Goldschläger argued that survivor testimony is essential, and that methodology used by historians can open the door to bias and manipulation.

Historians need to re-evaluate their opinions of survivor testimony, he contended.

Alain Goldschläger

Toronto social historian Paula Draper, an audience member who trained interviewers for Steven Spielberg's Shoah Foundation, acknowledged that some "old-timers" among her colleagues are appalled at the use of survivor testimonies, but said the second generation of Holocaust historians do use such testimony.

One of the largest collections of books written by Holocaust survivors is housed at the Holocaust Literature Research Institute in London, Ont. which Goldschläger formed four years ago at Western.

Holocaust deniers confronted with witness testimonies tend to "multiply the number of little errors to undermine the text in toto," said Goldschläger.

To reject an entire testimony on the basis of a few factual errors is "ludicrous," he stated. "For most of us, it is easy to understand that for someone who has spent a week in a sealed cattle car with no air to breathe, no light to see, no food to eat, their first concern was not what date it was."

The timing of the writing affects the way events are understood by the writer, Goldschläger noted, outlining five categories into which Holocaust survivor testimonies fall:

- Wartime, mainly diaries and short notes. These are "the most raw," written with no notion of history.
- Immediate post-war (1945-1952), written by people impelled to recall events for their own sanity, as well as to expose stories to the public.
- 1952-1979, characterized by serious disinterest, even a negative reception, by the public, with a concomitant drop in numbers of survivor memoirs.
- 1979-1990, the most prolific period, triggered in many cases by a realization that anti-Semitism still existed and a desire to refute Holocaust deniers. These memoirs generally include a broader context, and are aimed at the upcoming generation, often their own grandchildren.
- 1990 and later, with an even wider focus and in the context of widespread media coverage.

Addressing the issue of accuracy after so many years, Goldschläger noted that modern-day witnesses fall into two groups: those who acknowledge that time has blurred their memories, aside from some specific recollections; and those who affirm that their experiences were so traumatic that they remember every single detail.

"We tend to give more credence to testimony that offers moments of intense recollection," he said.

He noted the tendency by some writers to focus on memories that are "iconic" of the Shoah, such as Auschwitz. "Passing over" time spent in a lesser-known camp, for example, reduces the understanding of the entire experience and has the "unfortunate effect of relegating some groups as if their suffering were of less value."

Palestinians said to be seeking Western intervention in dispute

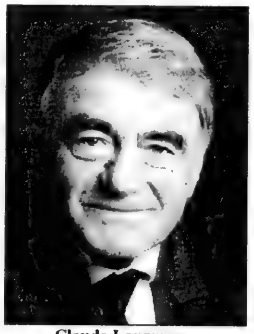
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Claude Lanzmann believes that the Palestinians have launched a concerted campaign to pressure Western countries to intervene in the Arab-Israeli dispute at Israel's expense.

"The Palestinians want to internationalize the conflict, to recreate what happened in Kosovo," said Lanzmann, an internationally renowned French filmmaker, in reference to the current fighting in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Lanzmann, who has close ties to Israel, suggested that the Palestinian leadership is pursuing a strategy which turns on Western intervention in the disputed territories.

Last year, Western nations bombed Serbia for 78 days and placed a multinational peacekeeping force in the rebellious Yugoslavian province of Kosovo after Serbian troops launched an ethnic cleansing offensive against ethnic Albanians there.



Claude Lanzmann

Lanzmann, whose 1973 film, Israel Why, premiered in the United States on the second day of the Yom Kippur War, expressed pessimism about the present situation.

"It is becoming more difficult," said Lanzmann, who was here to discuss his latest movie, A Visitor From the Living, at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies. "To the Arabs, Israel is an 'original sin.'"

The Palestinians, he intimated in an interview prior to his lecture, do not fear the prospect of high casualties.

"Israel will use more and more force and the world will condemn Israel. The Palestinians know it."

What is so astonishing about the Palestinians' resort to violence is that Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak was ready for such huge concessions, Lanzmann said.

He chided Likud opposition leader Ariel Sharon for inflaming Arab opinion by visiting the Temple Mount in the company of some 1,000 policemen. But he also criticized the Palestinians' disproportionate response.

In an indirect critique of Israeli policy, Lanzmann said Israel has made "many mistakes" in its dealings with the Palestinians. He did not elaborate, but said the Palestinians want "a real state, not pieces of it."

Suggesting that the roots of the current disturbances stem from the intractable nature of the final-status issues facing Israel and the Palestinians, Lanzmann said the Oslo peace process is at a crossroads. "I don't know if it's over."

In France, Israel has been widely condemned by left-wing intellectuals. "They have not attacked [Yasser] Arafat. The discussion is more and more one-sided."

Israel's image in France has been blackened. Israel is "the killer of children."

The French media have not adopted a balanced approach. "But this is an old story," he observed in exasperation.

Turning to A Visitor From the Living, he described it as "a complex, subtle film." It is an extended dialogue between Lanzmann and Maurice Rossel, a former Swiss Red Cross official who visited the Theresienstadt concentration camp in 1944 and subsequently wrote a glowing report about it.

"Rossel was blind. The Germans wanted to deceive him, and he was deceived by his own anti-Jewish prejudices, too."

Rossel repeatedly rejected his requests for an interview, but relented when Lanzmann and a film crew showed up at his home in Switzerland unannounced. "I asked him, 'Please let us in.' I had a soft voice and a gentle face. He said yes."

"But I was always afraid he would end the interview," he added. "I had to stop and reload the camera every 11 minutes."

Lanzmann, a French resistance fighter during the German occupation, regards Shoah, a landmark in Holocaust filmography, as his greatest movie. "It still shocks."

Contemptuously dismissing Holocaust deniers, he said, "I'm not interested in these people. For me, it's not really an issue."

A gruff and aloof man, Lanzmann was reluctant to discuss his newest film, which he is just finishing.

"Let's say it is a love story. You will see it soon."

Menashe Reichman. A Portrait of Inner Strength

January 1965 - Menashe Reichman was sent on an urgent mission to the Israeli border, one that changed his life forever: an explosion tore his body to pieces. Swinging between life and death, he overcame pain, disbelief and months of surgeries.

Menashe lost both legs, was blinded in one eye and was left with limited vision in the other eye. It took over a year until he was finally able to sit in a wheelchair.

Attending The Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv since it opened in 1974, Menashe works out in the gym, swims, competes in wheelchair javelin and writes satire. He is a member of the wheelchair dance troupe, a Beit Halochem program that introduced him to his love of dance, and then the love of his life, Ayala, the mother of his beautiful daughter, Adi.

Menashe Reichman calls Beit Halochem a true home. "In the whole world there is nothing like it. Bless the visionary and the implementers of this great idea. For me it is a branch of paradise upon earth." He believs his adjustment, strength and interest in life, is due to the supportive environment at Beit Halochem.

With Beit Halochem and his family by his side, Menashe believes that everything and anything is possible.

The other 48,000 disabled veterans also have the DETERMINATION to reach their potential.

JF&CS program helps children exposed to abuse

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While abuse was happening, one child would enter an opening in the basement wall, hiding right next to the insulation.

That child is now in Jewish Family & Child Services' program for children exposed to woman abuse and the story was one way JF&CS social worker Janice Shaw put a human face on a beneficiary of UJA FEDERATION campaign dollars.

Shaw spoke last week to participants on a local "bus mission" sponsored by Women's Campaign & Advocacy, which raises about 10 percent of campaign funds.

After hearing Shaw speak at the Lipa Green building, participants visited Zareinu, a school for students with developmental disabilities, and the counter-missionary group Jews for Judaism.

The event was the second in a series of three bus missions. The third – which will visit Just A Second, the used clothing shop run by JF&CS, and the Holocaust Memorial & Education Centre – will take place Nov. 15.

Shaw's program, which is affiliated with JF&CS's woman abuse program, aims to reduce the isolation of children exposed to abuse, teach them safety skills and appropriate responsibility for behaviour, and provide hope that things can be different.

"Programs like this are critical," she said, noting that government funding cuts have affected preventive programs.

The program "doesn't get funded if campaign doesn't fund it," said Elana Paice of UJA FEDERATION.

Shaw is seeing more youngsters in the four to seven age group, compared to a greater number of adolescents in previous years. "It's very sad, but what that's telling me is that women are reaching out earlier."

At Zareinu, located in the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill, the tour included a fast-paced series of introductions to teachers, occupational therapists, music therapists and a social worker, and a visit to a brightly decorated nursery school classroom. The school offers individualized programs for children from birth to adolescence and is partially funded with campaign dollars.

At the nearby office of Jews for Judaism, Rabbi Michael Skobac, senior counsellor and educational director, said his office – a local branch of an international organization – receives 40 to 50 messages a day from people in crisis, such as parents whose children don't want to be Jewish any more. Underscoring his words, his talk was punctuated by a constantly ringing telephone.

"We have, thank God, a lot of success stories," Rabbi Skobac said, adding that one person returned to Judaism after more than 30 years of being involved with Jews for Jesus.

There are about 50 organizations in the office's purview – primarily Ontario – trying to convert Jews, he said. One congregation has its own day school, he noted.

A short video shocked the visitors with, among other things, a messianic Christian explanation of the three matzot at the Passover seder as "the father, son and the Holy Ghost."

To reach Jews, messianic Christians "format Christianity to feel Jewish," the rabbi explained.

Rabbi Skobac and Julius Ciss, Jews for Judaism's executive director, take turns standing outside next-door messianic congregation City of David about once a month on Friday nights, making themselves available for those willing to listen to them. They also attend "Hebrew Christian" conferences on a regular basis, and provide counselling and programming in the community.

"We try to serve as a catalyst in the Jewish community for spiritual revival and educational excellence."

The Synagogue And The 21st Century

As the future hurtles furiously towards us, how can the synagogue respond without abandoning the claims of the past? How can the synagogue provide community when the individual and the family demand a sense of place and purpose? Three experts will reflect on the role of the synagogue — the place of learning and music, prayer and religious community — as we look towards the future.

The Dambusters: A war story to remember

By ANNA MORGAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Fifty-seven years ago, 19 airplanes of the 617 Squadron took off from England to bomb the Mohne and Eder dams in the industrial Ruhr valley in Germany.

Due to the successful completion of the mission, which has since become known as the Dambusters Raid, German steel production fell over 500,000 tons, significantly affecting the German war effort at that time.

Srgt. Albert Garshowitz

Aboard one of the Lancaster planes, was wireless operator Sgt. Albert Garshowitz, a 22-year-old Jewish boy from Hamilton who never came home.

This past summer, five members of the Garshowitz family travelled to the Reichswald Forest War Cemetery, which lies on the border of Germany and Holland, to recite Kaddish at Albert's grave.

"My brother Albert, left home on the afternoon of my bar mitzvah," said David Garshowitz in an interview.

"Immediately after a small kiddush at the old Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton, the whole family went to take Albert to Trenton.

"As a general rule my parents never drove on Shabbat, but on this occasion they did drive," David recalled.

"From Trenton, he went on to train in Brandon, Man. and then Windsor, Ont.," said David's son, Hartley.

"For the past four or five years, I've been compiling information about Albert and the mission.

"I discovered that in England, the Dambusters Raid was remembered as a major event," Hartley said. "In 1993, there was a 50th reunion and 85,000 attended.

"Two movies have been made about the mission."

Apparently, Hartley said, the raid was initiated because Barnes Wallis, a British scientist, conceived of the idea of a skipping bomb which could be used to specifically attack the dams in the Ruhr valleys.

The bombs had to be dropped at very low altitudes in mountainous terrain and then had to skip along the water until they hit the sides of the dams. At the time, it seemed like an impossible task, he said.

"In February or March of 1943, the Bomber Command was convinced by Wallis that the skipping bomb would work.

"The 617 Squadron was then put together by Wing Commander Guy Gibson, and the raid was given a flying deadline of the middle of May – when the rivers were at their highest levels.

"Everything was done secretly. Until just before the raid, they weren't told what their targets were. All they knew was that they were training for low-level flying."

Albert Garshowitz, Canadian Regiment Number 84377 and the ninth child of a family of 12, was on board one of the eight planes that went down that night.

"When the telegram came, announcing that Albert was missing in action, I was with my mother. It was a very difficult moment, a moment I can't describe," said David.

"My parents, Samuel and Sarah (Borovoy) Garshowitz both came from the Ukraine," David said. "My father arrived in Canada in 1903 after a five-year service in the Czars' army. My mother came with her parents in 1907."

Albert was born in Hamilton and went to the McIlwraith Public School and then to the Central Collegiate Institute.

"When he was in high school, Albert played football. At that time, one of the boys he played against, Frank Garbus, played on the Catholic Cathedral High School.

"They both later played together on a semi-pro team in Hamilton called the Eastwood Lyons.

"Then, the two boys joined the air force together, they trained together, they were in the same squadron together and they died in the same plane together," David said.

"Frank Garbus' nephew, Paul Morley of Hamilton, came on our recent tour to Germany," Hartley said.

Albert's sisters, Goldie Robbins and Margaret Ludwig, David and his wife, Libby, and their son Hartley read K'El Maleh Rachamim and sprinkled earth from Israel on Albert's grave.

"We placed Canadian flags, pictures and stones on the graves," Libby said. "We were helped with that by the people on the tour.

"In fact, our trip to the cemetery was a very participatory trip. We felt really good relations with people we had never seen before and will never see again.

"I was struck by the beauty of the cemetery," Libby said, "and with the number of Jewish graves.

"How beautifully it is all kept, the velvety green grass…and how out of keeping it all is when compared to the carnage and wreckage of war."

Not unique to East Toronto, this approach is part of a company-wide commitment to providing help where help is needed. Underscoring this fact, in 1999 the CIBC donated some $26 million to a wide variety of charities and causes, including the Baycrest Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Community Centre 55, Toronto East General Hospital, several schools, and countless community projects.

D'Amico favours a hands-on approach that sees him personally participating in fund-raising and other charitable events. He also takes pleasure in encouraging employees, associates and friends to do likewise.

D'Amico brings to the table an extensive background in both banking and volunteer work. And as someone who has lived and worked in the East Toronto area for a number of years, he is well-positioned to turn CIBC's strong presence in the area (14 branches) to good account.

Building goodwill starts within each branch, he says. "We want every single visit to be a happy one for our customers. This is a standard we strive to uphold each and every day." Good works outside the branch are a natural extension of this philosophy, he says. "We want people to think of the CIBC not only as a great place to bank, but as a good neighbour."

D'Amico's approachability, easygoing manner and work ethic have endeared him to East Toronto business people and members of the general community, and he relishes the opportunity to serve. The sense that he is helping to make a difference gives him "all the gratification I need. Giving back to the community isn't something that's nice to do, it's something we have to do."

When Solomon played the Marseillaise in Marseilles

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It was 1944 and Cpl. Stanley Solomon, a performer with The Blackouts, a RCAF entertainment troupe, had just arrived in Marseilles from Paris with an advance convoy bringing in instruments, costumes and scenery to stage a series of shows for Canadian and American service personnel in the area.

The hungry convoy members stopped in front of a restaurant when Sgt. Maj. Fran Dowie, who was in charge, spotted an elderly fiddler on a corner across the street.

Knowing that Solomon was both a violinist and violist who played with the Promenade Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Reginald Stuart in Toronto's Varsity Arena before enlisting, he urged him to help the man.

"He was as old as Methuselah," Solomon remembers. "He could hardly stand up. He had a straggly beard, his nose dripped and he was very shabby. He scratched away with his bow but almost no sound came out. People didn't even notice him. And the fiddle was out of tune, so out of tune!" Solomon winces.

He asked the old man for the instrument and tuned it. Then he began to play. Passers-by stopped and a few came up close. Soon they were joined by others. As Solomon played on, putting heart and soul into popular tunes and classics, a crowd gathered.

Dowie quickly borrowed a large hat and as the music poured out, everyone joined in, keeping time, singing, clapping and filling the hat brim-full of francs while the bemused owner of the fiddle looked on, shaking and weeping.

"I played for at least half an hour," Solomon recalls, "and I ended with The Marseillaise ... de de de boom de de de boom de de de ... The old man took the money and went off, crying but happy."

It was only then that Solomon joined the others in the restaurant. "I felt so good!" he says.

After the war, he joined the Minneapolis Symphony for a year before returning to his hometown of Toronto and joined the Toronto Symphony Orchestra where he remained for 39 years, 37 as principal violist. In 1989 he retired and was named principal violist emeritus.

Now in his 83rd year, the gregarious musician still plays with the Hamilton Symphony, the Brantford Symphony and the Toronto Senior Strings.

"My shoulder hurts from time to time," he notes, "so I've cut down, a little."

Many years ago, his father Nathan, was a clarinetist with the Queen's Own Rifles and it was this Jewish father's dream that some day one of his four sons would become a prominent violinist. The musical legacy continues.

Solomon's daughter Meribeth, a composer/arranger is, with her former husband Micky Erbe, a partner in Mickymar, which produces music for television programs. His son Leonard, is a noted jazz and classical violinist who has soloed with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

Shell family holds a special bar mitzvah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jeremiah Shell celebrated his bar mitzvah last summer. He spent the year before practising for it and his family expended a lot of energy preparing for it.

Jeremiah, now 14, is physically challenged and unable to speak. He has been a student at Zareinu for over 11 years.

His mother, Barbara Ostroff, spoke to The CJN on the family's backyard porch, while Jeremiah listened. She said that she felt it was important for Jeremiah to have a bar mitzvah.

"There are many things he doesn't do. He will grow up to be an adult who needs assistance. That doesn't mean he won't be active," she said.

"This community needs to know this child, and be proud of him."

Ostroff gives high marks to Jeremiah's teachers at Zareinu, who put together a special curriculum for him, in which his whole class took part.

The school's communicative disorders assistants, Becki Handley and Cindy Moylan, and his teacher, Lena Rodos, helped him and his classmates learn about the Jewish community. They took them on trips to the Beach synagogue, and to the Pape Avenue Cemetery, the first Jewish cemetery in Toronto.

Jeremiah took part in Jeremiah's Food Drive, which collects non-perishable food that is then given to Tomchei Shabbos, an organization that gives Shabbat food baskets to the Jewish poor. Jeremiah helped receive the food and pack it for distribution.

The family and the school decided that Jeremiah could do the tallit blessing, even though he cannot speak. A device was created with two large buttons connected to voice outlets. When Jeremiah pressed the buttons, the congregation heard his brother, Adam, read the brachah.

Jeremiah's grandmother, Sophie Shell, has customarily given each of her grandchildren a tallit when they became bar or bat mitzvah.

"She never expected to be giving one to Jeremiah," an emotional Ostroff said.

During the Torah reading at the Darchei Noam Synagogue, the whole family, including Jeremiah, came up to the bimah. Ostroff recited the Maftir, and Adam read the Haftorah.

A big crowd attended, including school classmates, family, friends and therapists. Bulletin boards outside the kiddush room had pictures of what Jeremiah and his classmates had learned and done during the year to prepare for the big event.

The class made a large cardboard canvas, which they decorated with flowers and paint. The canvas illustrated the good things that happen to Jewish people, like bar mitzvahs, weddings, praying at the Kotel; and the bad things, such as the recent bombings in Israel.

The highlight of the day was a speech, written from Jeremiah's perspective and read by his sister, Laura. The participants were given sheets with symbols illustrating what was said.

The speech talked about how the Torah teaches that all people should be treated with respect, compassion and understanding – that he has learned to love by the love he received from his family and his school; that the food drive proved that everyone is capable of helping others; the importance of being a mentsch.

It also spoke of lessons that people sometimes forget – "Just because I do not talk does not mean that I do not feel or love."

For the first time this year, Jeremiah was able to walk independently a little bit. He was even able to dance with his mother at the party. Ostroff tears when she thinks of that.

Sophie and Jeremiah Shell share a happy moment during the rehearsal for Jeremiah's bar mitzvah. On the table is the communication device that was used for the tallit blessing.

Murder suspect remanded in custody

TORONTO — The lengthy legal process to determine the fates of three young men charged in the death of Dmitri (Matti) Baranovski continued this week after an Israeli suspect was returned to Canada in handcuffs.

Daniel Weiz, 20, along with two 17-year-olds being tried as adults, were scheduled to appear in court earlier this week to set a date for their preliminary hearing.

Weiz, who now wears a kippah, was remanded in custody pending a preliminary hearing. On the same day, Ontario Court Justice Charles Vaillancourt ruled the two teenagers could be tried as adults.

The decision means the youths, if convicted, could face a maximum sentence of life imprisonment compared to a maximum of seven years in jail if they were tried as young offenders.

Baranovski's mother, Olga, and his stepfather, Elliott Korczak, shouted "yes" when Vaillancourt made his ruling.

"Well, now they're going to see what justice is all about," Korczak later said to reporters outside court.

Weiz was visiting his father in Toronto while on leave from the Israeli army when the savage assault on Baranovski took place on Nov. 14, 2000 in G. Ross Lord Park in north Toronto. A group of masked youths approached Baranovksi and some friends and demanded cigarettes and money. When he spoke up, the group set upon Baranovski, punching and kicking him. Baranovski died of his injuries.

A week later, Weiz returned to Israel. Canada sought his extradition, and after a legal battle an Israeli court ruled he could be returned to Canada, but if convicted, he would be returned to Israel to serve his sentence.

Plans unveiled for BJCC

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A plan to make the Bathurst Jewish Centre a state-of-the-art campus that will become a focal point for Jewish activities was announced by president Bruce Leboff at the centre's recent annual meeting.

As part of this move, the meeting, chaired by past president Tom Lobel, approved a change in the centre's name; it will become the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC).

In her report, executive director Sherry Kulman said the centre's goals for the coming year include a drive to have a more competitive marketing position and more cohesion in fund-raising.

Total revenue of more than $6.5 million, an excess of $287,916 in revenues over expenditures for the year ending June 30, was reported by financial director Brian Yellin.

Financial assistance to members was slightly higher than in 1999, and membership fees were down by about $72,000. Income earned from funds administered by the United Jewish Welfare Fund increased.

The BJCC has an operating line of credit of $2.5 million at the bank, and guarantees of another $2.5 million have been provided by the United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto.

The summer camps, with 770 children taking part, are the largest in the city, Leboff reported, with 40 percent of the campers subsidized. The BJCC has the largest Jewish day-care service in Toronto, and more than 2,000 new Canadians were able to participate in either athletics or arts. In many cases, he said, this was their only contact with the Jewish community.

More than 100 volunteers received certificates of recognition from volunteer co-ordinator Sue Rosenblat. This is the first time that awards have been given to such a large group, she said. Kulman paid tribute to the work of the senior staff, Jim Emery, Janis Roth, Diane Uslaner, Brian Yellin and Kailah Rubin.

The opening of a new exhibit, You and Me Around the World, at the Jewish Discovery Place museum for children, directed by Katya Rudzik, followed the meeting.

Labour Zionist activist dies at 74

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Josef Krystal, who was national president of the Labour Zionist Alliance of Canada, died recently after a long illness. He was 74.

Owner of the Krystal Cap Company, he was active in the business until he became ill. His son Steven, who worked with him in the business for 20 years, is continuing to run the company.

Krystal and his wife Paulie were married in Bergen Belsen on Dec. 24, 1946, after the camp was liberated. He had worked as a slave labourer for the Nazis in Germany and Holland, making caps for the German forces. After the war, he went to Bergen Belsen with his father, Frank, who died in Canada 10 years ago.

In Bergen Belsen, Krystal met his future wife, who had gone to the camp after the war to be reunited with her brother Irving.

Krystal lost his mother, three brothers and a sister in the Holocaust; his wife lost her father.

"When he was in hospital recently, he called over a nurse and told her he was afraid that they were coming to take him away to a concentration camp," Paulie Krystal told The CJN.

In addition to his interest in Labour Zionism, Krystal raised money for the Meir Hospital in Kfar Saba, Israel, and the emergency ward there is named in honour of Josef and Paulie Krystal.

Surviving Krystal, in addition to his wife and Steven, are a daughter, Sharon Gottlieb, and another son, Marty, both of Toronto, and five grandchildren.

Victim of the media war speaks out

By TUVIA GROSSMAN

I was thrust into the international limelight when The New York Times and other major media outlets published a photo of me – bloodied and battered – crouching beneath a club-wielding Israeli policeman. The caption identified me as a Palestinian victim of the new intifada. In fact, I am a 20-year-old Jewish student from Chicago, studying at a yeshiva in Jerusalem.

Here's how it all happened

It was the eve of Rosh Hashana,and I hailed a taxi with two of my friends to go visit the Western Wall. Along the way, the driver took a shortcut through one of the Arab neighborhoods in Jerusalem. We turned a corner and suddenly there were about 40 Palestinians surrounding the car. Before we knew it, huge rocks had smashed all the windows of the taxi.

Crisis in Israel

Some of the Palestinians pulled open the door and dragged me from the vehicle. About 10 attackers jumped on top of me, punching and kicking me. I crouched to the ground and tried to cover my face to protect myself as much as possible. All I could see were a flurry of sneakers kicking me in the face.

Then I felt a strong pair of hands grabbing me, and I uncovered my face because I thought someone was trying to help me. But it was just another Palestinian; he held the back of my head and punched me square in the face. I fell flat on the ground and the Palestinians jumped on top of me again. One of them stabbed me in the back of my leg, ripping through muscles and tendons. Two other Palestinians held my head so I couldn't move, while two more bashed rocks onto my head...again and again and again.

By this time the beating had gone on for about eight minutes. I had already lost three liters of blood and was losing consciousness. I said "Shema Yisrael" – the declaration of faith that a Jew says before he dies. I tried not to black out, because I was sure if I did it would be the end.

Because it was the eve of Rosh Hashanah, the image of a shofar flashed through my mind, and I recalled a Biblical story I'd learned in school. The prophet Gideon and his 300 men were badly outnumbered against the Midianite army of 130,000. So Gideon's troops banged pots and blew shofars, hoping that the noise would scare the enemy. With God's help, the ploy worked and Gideon won the battle.

So I yelled at the top of my lungs. The Palestinians were startled momentarily, and I was able to get up and run. Unfortunately, I am heavily nearsighted and my contact lenses had fallen out. So there I was – barely able to see a thing, with blood pouring down my face and my leg badly wounded – being chased up a hill by 40 Palestinians throwing rocks at me.

It was a miracle, but I somehow out-ran them and reached a gas station where Israeli soldiers were posted.

I collapsed on the ground, and that's when a group of freelancer photographers started snapping pictures. An Israeli policeman was protecting me, yelling at the Palestinians to back off from finishing the lynching. But the photo – sent throughout the world by the Associated Press – identified me as a Palestinian. The obvious implication was that the Israeli policeman had just beaten me. In truth, it was the total opposite. I was a Jewish victim of Palestinian attackers.

It's bad enough to be beaten bloody, get stitches up and down my head and have my leg so severely stabbed that therapy is required to regain use of it. But to be used as a pawn in the media war, as part of the Palestinian propaganda to gain international sympathy, well, that hurts even more.

When a photo gets published, there are many links in the chain, and in this case, I don't know where the fault for the garbled caption lies. But it is deeply disturbing that the New York Times, the Associated Press (and everyone else in-between) assumed that if it's a victim, it must be a Palestinian.

There is a great struggle here in Israel and this event highlights the power of the media to influence public opinion. If truth is to prevail, we can't just "read" the newspaper. Be discerning and become part of the process. Otherwise, you're just a passive object of someone else's agenda.

Who are the innocent victims and who are the aggressors? The truth is often the opposite of how it appears.

Edmonton shuls hit by fire bombs

Abugov pointed out that the congregation took possession of the new $5-million synagogue in May after a five-year building campaign.

Last week's attacks came three weeks after a Molotov cocktail was thrown at the outside of the Beth Shalom Synagogue, causing "scorch marks," Loomer said.

Loomer said he has fielded numerous calls from synagogue members, as well as from members of the interfaith group in which he's involved.

"Based on calls I've received from non-Jews, there's a lot of concern over these incidents, and they've condemned the actions," he said.

Nora Abou-Absi, executive-director of the Canadian-Arab Friendship Association, was reported in the Edmonton Sun as saying: "It's absolutely unacceptable and the attitude of all people is, 'Who is the idiot that's doing this?'

"There's a lot of frustration out there, but you don't harm places of worship, and that's the attitude in Jerusalem," Abou-Absi said.

Abugov suggested that "we don't know if this is connected to Israel or not."

In Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Manuel Prutschi said that "in light of what has been going on, I would strongly suspect it's related" to events in the Middle East.

Prutschi, national director of community relations for Congress, noted there has been a dramatic upsurge in anti-Semitic incidents around the world, including Canada.

"You've had arson in a number of cities around the world. Logic suggests it's Middle East-related."

In Montreal last week, arsonists targeted the Hessed Shelemus Emis, a memorial chapel, with a firebomb that destroyed the building's front room, he said, while the doors of an Ottawa synagogue were burned in an earlier arson attack.

While the level of anti-Semitic incidents has jumped recently, Prutschi doesn't believe the attacks in Canada are part of a co-ordinated effort.

"There are extremists in every community and individuals who will act alone or in small groups. I don't doubt they're incited by the inflammatory rhetoric that's been coming out of the Middle East."

That includes calls for jihad (holy war) and fatwas (religious edicts) to kill Jews, emanating from clerics in Gaza, he said. There have even been a couple of fatwas issued in Britain, prompting the Board of Deputies of British Jews to call on police to lay criminal charges against a number of Islamic extremists, he added.

In Canada, Congress is urging prosecutors to request stiffer sentences against those convicted in connection with anti-Semitic incidents. That is especially applicable in cases involving places of worship. Prutschi said.

Congress is also calling on federal authorities to pass legislation making it illegal for front organizations of terrorist groups to raise funds in Canada, he added.

An anti-Semitic incident in Hamilton has prompted a community response that touched the Jewish victims of graffiti vandalism.

In mid-October, as violence raged in the Middle East, vandals wrote "Jews die" on the wall between a kosher deli and kosher butcher shop. Other locations in Hamilton, including an area near the city's Conservative synagogue, were targeted with similar graffiti, said Hamutal Deckel, principal of the Kehila Jewish Community Day School.

"Obviously we were concerned," Deckel said. "It's not too far from us. We thought of the people who did this, what will they do next?"

"It was upsetting, no question," said Meir Kaidar, owner of Westdale Delicatessen.

"I think it was a very low style," Kaidar said. "I hope it was only hot-headed kids who did this."

Police are investigating the incident, but it was the response from his neighbours across the street that most touched Kaidar. The minister and an elder of St. Cuthbert's Presbyterian Church presented Kaidar with a letter signed by 42 members of the congregation. The letter expressed "to you, a neighbour in our Westdale community, our sadness in learning of an act of intolerance and bigotry against you this past week.

"We deplore this act!" the letter stated. "We are troubled by the fear for the safety of yourself, your family and friends, that this incident may have aroused. Please know of our solidarity in standing with you against such acts.

"Please know too that we have humbly and earnestly prayed this day, and will continue to pray, that justice and mercy be served in this city of Hamilton."

Kaidar received a second letter from David Cummings, the pastor of Hamilton Christian Fellowship, who expressed the fellowship's "profound regret at this evil crime.

"On behalf of the people of Hamilton Christian Fellowship, please be assured that we respect and honour the Jewish community of this city. As gentiles, we grieve this act of vandalism and hatred and we want you to know that we stand with you against such attacks.

"May God be your shield and your comfort… Shalom," the letter states.

Kaidar said he was moved by the support he had received. "It was so touching. I sent them a thank you letter," and provided the members of St. Cuthbert's with a pastry tray, he said.

OMISSION

The story, "Jewish candidates on campaign trail for municipal offices" (CJN, Nov. 2), about candidates running in Toronto's municipal election, omitted the name of David Lipton, who is running in Ward 16.

Lipton, 33, is the owner of two businesses who has lived in the ward his entire life, supports a number of charitable organizations and is an active member of the Jewish community. We regret the omission.

BBC documents anti-Semitic incidents in Que.

MONTREAL — The number of documented anti-Semitic incidents in Quebec since the new Mideast violence broke out has clearly been on the rise, community leaders agree.

But one Jewish community spokesperson cautions against drawing analogies between the manifestations of anti-Semitism so far seen in the province with the level or scope of those that took place during World War II.

B'nai Brith Quebec director Robert Libman said that, although there has been a troubling increase in the number of anti-Semitic acts, the majority have not involved violence against individuals or been of a "very violent nature."

Libman disagreed with the analogy drawn in a recent issue of the National Post that referred to an "explosion" of anti-Semitism in Canada as the "worst concentrated outbreak… since the Second World War."

This is "media sensationalism," Libman said, adding that such comparisons "go too far" and trivialize the true horror that the Jews of Europe experienced 60 years ago.

"We have not got a society that has become so violent that we have to fear pogroms," he said.

At the same time, Libman said, "there's no question that there have been a lot of incidents" since the violence in the Middle East erupted at the beginning of October. B'nai Brith issued a recent list of 14 incidents in Quebec between Oct. 1 and Oct. 25, ranging from the not so serious, such as anonymous threatening phone calls and anti-Semitic graffiti found on a park boulder, to much more severe incidents including physical assaults.

The list of Quebec incidents compiled by B'nai Brith did not include recent Palestinian demonstrations where participants called for the death of Jews.

The documented incidents include:

• Two swastikas were found Oct. 5 on the walls of a St. Laurent synagogue. On the same date, graffiti equating the Star of David with a swastika were found at a Montreal elementary school.

• A group of 25 Palestinian demonstrators gathered at the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue during Kol Nidre services on Oct. 8. Police, however, succeeded in dispersing them.

• On Yom Kippur day, a man returning home from a St. Laurent Synagogue was attacked by four young adults.

• On Oct 10, several synagogues received threatening phone calls, presumably from the same individual, B'nai Brith says, in which Jews were accused of being "dogs" and "animals."

• Also on Oct. 10, two men began yelling at a 10-year-old girl as she entered her school.

• Again on Oct. 10, a student at École Secondaire Emile Legault was pushed and shoved by more than a dozen schoolmates because she was wearing a Star of David.

• Two other incidents on Oct. 10 took place in the Montreal Metro system. In the first, two youths accosted a 16-year-old boy wearing a yarmulke, knocked it off his head and began to assault him before another passenger intervened and gave the boy time to leave the subway car at the Plamondon station.

In the second, even more serious incident, a Jewish man, also wearing a yarmulke, was walking with his fiancée inside the Lionel Groulx station when two attackers, who appeared to be of Arab origin, demanded that he remove it. When he refused, they attacked him with a belt buckle and he collapsed unconscious on the platform. Only the intervention of some bystanders prevented the Jewish man from being thrown over the rails. The victim was taken to the Montreal General Hospital, where he was treated for concussion.

• On Oct. 12, four individuals got out of a car at a Jewish elementary school in St. Laurent, walked up to a classroom window, and began threatening the students and teacher. After school security warned them to leave and threatened to summon police, they got into their car but left behind a can of spray paint.

• Between Oct. 13 and Oct. 15, seven Jewish homes in Ste. Agathe were vandalized and their mezuzot were removed from the main door entrance. In one of the homes, paintings and furniture were destroyed and obscene graffiti were scrawled inside. The alleged offenders are to appear in criminal youth court.

• On Oct. 16, graffiti found on a boulder in Lachine Park read: "Judah=Nazis."

• A swastika was scrawled on a Jewish elementary school in St. Laurent, the fourth such incident at the same school since the start of the Mideast crisis.

• And on Oct. 15, graffiti equating Israel with the swastika were found at the entrance to the Shaar Hashomayim Cemetery in Outremont.

Teachers, schools in dispute over wage scales

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Teachers at six Jewish day schools are working to rule because of a dispute with their administrations.

About $1 million was issued by the education ministry in June to all public and subsidized private schools as a salary adjustment retroactive to 1995.

It is being held in trust by the Association of Jewish Day Schools (AJDS) which has been unsuccessfully negotiating with the teachers' union, the Federation of Teachers of Jewish Schools (FTJS).

The two sides are disputing the terms of pay scales. For years, salaries have been on par with what teachers are paid in public schools.

Close to 300 teachers last Thursday picketed outside Cummings House, where the AJDS offices are located, to draw attention to their grievances. Union members also voted to work to the letter of their contract only. This means principally that extracurricular activities teachers organize have been cancelled.

The adjustment package has become the hot point in the two sides' broader disagreement over what wage parity with the public sector means. The FTJS has taken the AJDS to court and an arbitrator is to be named by the labour ministry at a date not yet known.

"This year, for the first time in more than at least 30 years, the school corporations have decided not to follow the public sector's salary scale," said FTJS president Sylvia Amar.

She charged that the AJDS is using the money as a bargaining chip in talks.

She alleged that the AJDS is withholding the money because the schools are hoping the FTJS will not win the arbitration and therefore will not have to pay a retroactive adjustment equal to the public sector.

The school corporations affected are Hebrew Academy, Hebrew Foundation School, Jewish People's & Peretz Schools, United Talmud Torahs, Solomon Schechter Academy and École Maïmonide.

The schools claim they are paying their teachers according to the terms of the collective agreements.

The AJDS issued a statement that it is prepared to distribute the $1 million immediately, if the FTJS returns to negotiations and a distribution formula can be worked out. It has invested the money and promises to pay out any accumulated interest to the teachers when a formula is found. The government has stipulated that the money has to be returned in June, 2001, if it is not distributed to the teachers before then.

Amar said it is possible it will take 18 months to two years to get an arbitration ruling and that would mean the teachers would receive none of their retroactive salary.

Amar said simply spreading the $1 million among the approximately 420 members at the six schools is not the answer. That is because the amount was calculated by the ministry according to the number of general studies teachers in the schools, not the total staff which includes Jewish studies teachers as well.

Government subsidization of the day schools is limited to a percentage (about half) of the costs of the general studies curriculum only. The costs of Jewish studies must be covered by fees to parents, community assistance and other private fund-raising.

But both general and Jewish studies teachers belong to the FTJS and all have had wage parity with public school teachers.

"In the past when there have been salary adjustments for the public sector, whether increases, decreases or freezes, all of our teachers have been affected the same way," Amar said.

It is up to the schools or the community to make up for the difference, she said.

She calculates that the schools will have to come up with an additional $500,000 in order that all teachers in the Jewish schools receive an adjustment equal to their counterparts in the public schools.

The FTJS is asking that the sum now held by the AJDS be a "down payment" today toward what it considers full compensation to be paid out when the wage scale dispute is resolved.

The exact differential and how it should be arrived at appears to be at the crux of the dispute.

AJDS executive director Felix Meloul said that as the pay scales now stand, the schools would have to at least match or possibly find up to $1.5 million in order that the FTJS members receive the same adjustment as public school teachers.

Messianic congregation de-listing leaves questions

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — While the Canadian Jewish Congress applauds a recent decision to remove a messianic congregation from the synagogue listings in Vancouver's yellow pages, not all parties involved in the issue are satisfied by the result.

The vice-president of the company that publishes the listings, Dominion Information Services, said Dominion does not know if it made an error by moving Kehillath Tsion from the synagogue section to its new entry underneath the non-denominational churches' heading.

"There's obviously an ongoing debate surrounding messianic congregations that's way above Dominion's mandate to participate in," said Olivier Vincent.

"We're not about to judge this situation and I have no way to judge, either, whether we've made a good decision or not. I would love to hear from the highest Jewish authority in Canada about this because we will obey whatever they say is appropriate."

> Congress's Weintraub satisfied with the outcome

Earlier this year, CJC wrote a letter to Dominion explaining that Kehillath Tsion and other messianic congregations misrepresent themselves as Jewish institutions and synagogues.

Requesting that the congregation be removed from the synagogue section, CJC described messianic organizations as Christianity under the guise of Judaism for the purpose of proselytizing vulnerable Jews.

After receiving the letter, Dominion acted quickly to change the congregation's listing.

"We estimated there was a serious problem and that the name should be removed," said Vincent.

"We have literally millions of names in our databases and no way to verify everything. It's done on the basis of trust, and only when a claim or complaint arises do we make modifications. Now we've received complaints from Kehillath stating that they are unhappy."

Mark Weintraub, CJC's community relations' committee chair, is satisfied with the outcome. "[Dominion] took the appropriate steps and recognized clearly that this was a misrepresentation," he said.

"It was misleading and an attempt to [either] target Jews who might otherwise be ignorant about synagogues, or [target] Jews who have little identification within the community and attracting them to what is essentially part of the Christian faith."

Lionel Leslie, one of Kehillath Tsion's elders, was reluctant to be interviewed. He said he needed more time to develop his thoughts surrounding the yellow pages issue.

He did, however, emphasize his congregation's right to utilize the word synagogue.

Leslie said that while he estimates one-third of his congregation was born Jewish, he admits that Kehillath Tsion is not traditionally Jewish. "We are biblically Jewish," he said.

The congregation's Web site claims that it strives "to advance the Christian faith in accordance with the Scripture, within the Jewish cultural context."

It goes on to state that worship services are "Hebraic in nature and that Jewish culture and style are clearly evident in music, preaching and teaching."

The yellow pages issue falls under the umbrella of CJC's larger mandate to prohibit the appropriation of Jewish symbols, like the menorah and other Judaica, by non-Jewish groups.

"It's really all part of Congress's prioritization of educating both the Jewish community and the non-Jewish community of these attempts by Christians – and I mean a small minority of Christians – to really prey upon the most vulnerable members of the Jewish community," said Weintraub.

Look as young as you feel

Is it time to erase those telltale facial lines, that make you look older than you feel? If the answer's Yes, call Alexis Anti-Aging Experts.

Under normal human skin, there's a polysaccharide which keeps skin appearing young and supple, called hyaluronic acid. Unfortunately it contracts with age, causing unwanted wrinkles, folds and lines. Until recently, many treatments to slow this process have used animal collagens. These can generate allergies— including unpredictable delayed reactions.

Now, a Swedish company Q-Med has developed biosynthetic, non-animal forms of hyaluronic acid: the clear gels Restylane and Perlane. They're not allergenic, and require no skin tests or surgery.

Perlane is used for deeper folds, Restylane for those which are less so. They are administered in a near painless manner thanks to the use of state-of-the-art anesthetic (freezing) techniques including the use of a topical cream applied to the skin prior to the treatment, called EMLA.

These gels smooth out forehead lines, "crows feet", and lines between the eyes and across the bridge of the nose. They also soften the folds between nose and lip, and "marionette lines" from the corner of the mouth to the jaw. You see immediate results: as the doctor fills in the wrinkles they disappear.

Alexis Experts also offer lip sculpturing and enhancements. This gives the lips a distinct border, fills them out by adding volume and stops lips from "bleeding" at the facial lines. Lip treatments can literally create a "movie star" appearance and are probably the most popular treatment requested.

Another product which helps eliminate unwanted lines is BOTOX. It is injectable and completely relaxes the muscles which control facial expression — thus smoothing away existing lines, and discouraging new ones. It also permits Restylane and Perlane to remain in place longer.

Also, by relaxing facial muscles, BOTOX helps relieve tension headache, migraine and whiplash headache. If headaches are bothering you why not let the experts at Alexis improve and prevent them with BOTOX while making you look younger as a very desirable side benefit.

Consultations are also available in the privacy of your home or office both during the day or evenings. They are performed by experienced M.D.s who are experts in headache management and the use of BOTOX, Restylane and Perlane.

For a free consultation regarding your anti-aging needs, and/or headaches call Alexis Anti-Aging Experts at 416-483-3339.

Fair insurance for travellers from Ingle Life and Health

When you go on vacation to Florida or anywhere abroad, you naturally want medical insurance. If you have an accident or medical problem while you're away, though, you may find your insurance doesn't cover pre-existing conditions or their consequences.

Suppose that you have high blood pressure — and while you're away, you suffer a stroke or heart attack. If you spend a month in a US hospital, the extra coverage could literally cost a fortune, even wipe out your estate. Fees of $75,000 or more are not unheard of.

Some people ignore this danger. They buy insurance, and hope that they're covered, or that nothing happens. Others forego the pleasures of travel to avoid excessive premiums or inadequate coverage.

Recently, lawyer Warren Green took a personal interest in this problem. Some of his close relatives faced the risks described above. So, though not in the insurance business himself, he began a search for equitable coverage.

Green discovered that many insurance policies are vague in their wording: to put it politely, their language is highly elastic. Even if policyholders have legal training, and the patience to read in detail, they may find the fine print hard to interpret.

Sometimes, the policy doesn't cover any pre-existing conditions. In other cases, it's unclear whether it does; but the legal costs of finding out may be so high, it's less expensive to simply pay up.

Some insurers, to avoid paying, interpret the consequences of pre-existing conditions loosely. If you fall and break your leg, for example, and it can for any reason be ascribed to, say, high blood pressure, you may not be covered.

Some insurers use trivialities to avoid paying. Having a blood pressure pill prescribed even once, or having medication changed, can exclude you from coverage, or boost your premiums.

Moreover, it's easy to exploit seniors with health insurance. They expect to pay high premiums; and reading fine print may be physically taxing for them.

Undaunted by these findings, Green continued his search for fair coverage. Eventually, an insurance broker told him about Ingle Life and Health Insurance. Ingle offers a contract which is unique in three ways:

1) Ingle tailors your policy to your individual health requirements. Wherever you travel, Ingle Life & Health will undertake to fully cover pre-existing conditions, as well as problems arising from them.

2) Your doctor's statement defines your needs and coverage. Ingle pre-rates you, based on this statement.

3) What you pay is based on the duration of your trip, and your long-term health profile. Backed by over 53 years of experience Ingle, continues to anticipate the needs of travellers worldwide.

Also, if your problem allows you to be transported, Ingle has you flown home to a Canadian hospital. This not only saves costs: it's also psychologically reassuring to recover at home.

Ingle's coverage can include travel companions too. If your companion has to go home ahead of time due to an accident, both your trips home are covered. And if you have to stay extra days abroad because of an accident, your and your companion's extra stay is covered.

Does this sound like the insurance you need, but haven't been able to find? Contact Contact Eric Shulman at Health Source Plus (416) 445-0000 or Peter Tasker at Tasker Financial Services (416) 369-2992.

ATTENTION ALL TRAVELLERS:

The small print in existing policies could leave you without coverage when you are travelling. Do not put your estate in jeopardy because you did not carry appropriate health insurance.

Ingle Life & Health will undertake to "tailor make" an insurance policy to accommodate your specific health requirements. It will consider insuring pre-existing conditions and illnesses resulting from those pre-existing conditions. Your doctor's statement will define the need and the coverage. Pricing relates to your health profile and trip duration.

There is no contract like it!

Attend a seminar given by representatives of Ingle Life and Health when they will describe this new policy.

The seminar will be held at Birthright Israel trips gearing up for early 2001 departures

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The next round of Birthright trips to Israel, in January and February, will be the first ones in which participants will not all be on federation-affiliated trips.

"It's different than last year, when the only accredited organizer for Canada was the Canada-Israel Experience Centre," said Elizabeth Sokolsky, national director of Birthright Israel, the free trip for young Jewish adults age 18 to 26.

Of the over 1,000 Canadians registered for this winter's trip, 775 from across the country are going through the Canada-Israel Experience Centre. The rest are going with different organizations, including BBYO and Aish HaTorah.

Once the Israeli government became a funding partner of the project – joining philanthropists Michael Steinhardt and Charles Bronfman as well as local federations – there was an opening of the market to allow more providers to become accredited, at the request of Israel and the philanthropists, explained Sokolsky.

Trip organizers were given the right to request to recruit in other countries, she added, noting that it's up to the individual organizer to deliver pre-and post-trip programming.

"There were a number who wanted the option to recruit in Canada," said Sokolsky. Contingents from different countries travel at different times.

In Montreal, an effort is being made for different providers, including BBYO and the Sephardic Educational Centre, to work together, said Nancy Rosenfeld of the Montreal Birthright steering committee.

How do you "make a chevra" when local Birthright participants are not all on the same trip? asked Susan Jackson, director of community planning, continuity, culture and overseas affairs at UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, in an interview several weeks ago.

Jackson was particularly concerned about the logistics of integrating local students affiliated with non-local trips, and their counterparts travelling through the Canada-Israel Experience Centre, she said in early October. "We're trying to sort it all out ourselves."

In a followup last week, she said the issues are clearer now. "We'll have to gear our [pre-and post-trip] programming a little differently."

Although Jackson would prefer a more centralized system, she said she's "willing to try this and see what happens."

She was not aware of the type of programming being offered by other trip providers, but said that if participants are living in this community, the federation will offer them programming here.

Jackson stressed that Birthright has been working "terrifically well."

The Canadian experience has unique elements, according to Sandy Brown, chair of the UJA FEDERATION subcommittee responsible for Israel Experience trips.

"We're hoping all these groups will work with our Canada-Israel Experience Centre" to ensure a common element for Canadian participants, she said, noting that the groups had had contact. The federation-affiliated trips include Canada-related aspects, to display Canada's involvement in the Israeli scene, she noted, "so [participants] were able to understand their relationship between their community and the Israeli community."

Evolving process

The trip itineraries are not yet finalized, according to providers who were asked.

"We realize it is an evolving process," said Brown. "We're so positive about the opportunity for this trip. Everyone involved wants to get it right."

Rabbi Dan Rand, director of Aish HaTorah's Young Professional Campus Programs, and Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, provider of pre-and post-Birthright programming, have met, together with some of their respective staff members, to discuss, among other things, the possibility of working together on post-programming.

The Toronto Aish HaTorah contingent of the Birthright trip will fill one bus. The Aish HaTorah trip is a "truncated" version of the international outreach organization's three-week Jerusalem Fellowship trips.

The trip, which includes meetings with Israeli politicians, "outdoorsy" travel and presentations regarding Jewish values, needed only minor modifications to meet the Birthright criteria, said New York-based Rabbi Chanan Kaufman, executive director, Jerusalem Fellowships, North America.

Kaye said the issue of addressing changes in the Birthright provider system, has been put on the back burner in light of the recent violence in Israel.

To the best of his knowledge, and Sokolsky's, none of their participants have backed out because of the situation, although both have fielded phone calls from concerned parents and participants.

"We wouldn't put any student at risk," said Kaye. "Everyone's waiting to see what will be."

"We're constantly monitoring the situation there," said Sokolsky.

Barak, Arafat set to go to Washington

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Palestinian leaders have agreed to attend separate talks in Washington with President Clinton in an effort to calm the situation in the territories and find a way back to negotiations.

The two separate meetings with Clinton – Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat on Thursday and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak on Sunday – are once again reviving hopes that a way can be found out of the violence that has wracked the region since late September.

But ongoing clashes in the territories, combined with the assessment of Israeli security officials that Arafat continues to use violence for political gain, underscored the volatility and fragility of the situation.

Briefing the Israeli cabinet at its weekly meeting last week, top security officials said Arafat appears to be operating on two tracks – pursuing political gain through violence and maintaining his international standing by participating in diplomatic dialogue.

The cabinet meeting came the morning after an estimated 150,000 people took part in a memorial rally in Tel Aviv to mark the fifth anniversary of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination by a right-wing student.

Israeli PM urges peace during rally

With the ongoing violence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip hanging over the event, Barak made a plea for peace at the rally, held in the square where Rabin was gunned down.

Barak urged Arafat not to let extremists lead Israelis and Palestinians "on a path of pain and suffering." The prime minister also vowed to "turn over stone, seek every path and every way" to peace.

The violence in the territories has led some to question whether Rabin should ever have embarked on the Oslo peace process.

Reflecting this uncertainty about his legacy, images of Rabin together with Arafat – including their historic handshake when the first Oslo accord was signed on the White House lawn in September 1993 – were omitted from a biographical film screened at a memorial gathering organized by the Labour party last week.

According to the Israeli daily Ma'ariv, sources in the party said there was no directive from above to edit out the footage, but it was understood that in light of the ongoing violence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, it was preferable not to have prominent images of Arafat in the film.

At last week's cabinet meeting, security officials noted that while the intensity of clashes has diminished somewhat since the two sides reached a ceasefire agreement last week, the violence flared again last Saturday night in gun battles between Palestinians and Israeli troops.

The Israel Defence Force's chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz, told the ministers that Arafat is not exercising the control he has over the situation on the ground – Arafat could be reining in such groups as the armed Palestinian militias.

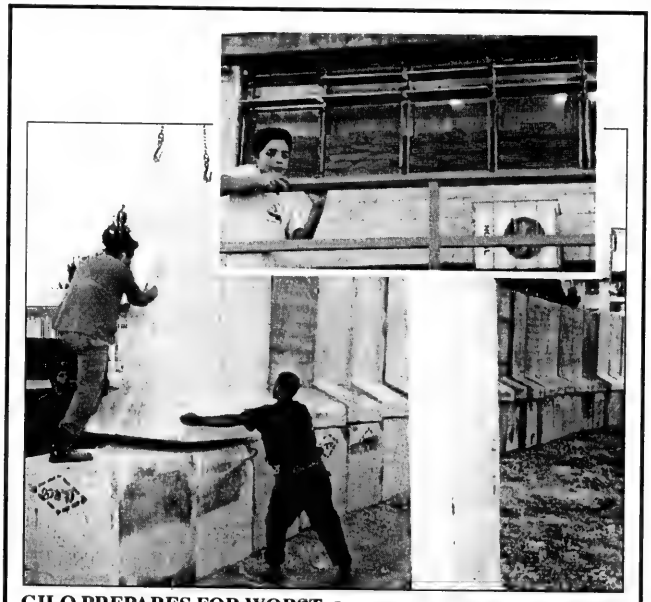
Other officials also said the Palestinian Authority continues to incite against Israel.

They warned of further terror attacks against Israel, citing the recent decision by Palestinian officials to release Islamic militants from prison.

Last week, two Israelis were killed after a car bomb exploded on a small side street near Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market.

The security officials also warned the cabinet that Iran has directed Hezbollah to try to kidnap Israeli civilians and soldiers, and that Iran is trying to recruit people to carry out suicide bombings against Israeli targets.

Clashes continued Sunday, when two Palestinians were shot dead during clashes with Israeli troops in the Gaza Strip. At least 10 Palestinians were wounded in these clashes, and seven were hurt in the West Bank outside Bethlehem.



GILO PREPARES FOR WORST: Jerusalem's southern neighbourhood of Gilo has begun to protect residents from possible injury from fire coming from the neighbouring village of Beit Jala. Tanzim militia have almost on a daily basis been coming into Beit Jala and firing on Gilo from locations mainly near to churches. Concrete fire walls have been set up on the southern aspect of Gilo, and schools that might be in direct fire have had sandbags placed on exposed windows.

Diaspora Jews converge on Israel in show of support

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM – Singing Hebrew songs, waving Israeli flags, and holding placards declaring their support for the State of Israel, some 1,200 people from around the world marched from Zion Gate to the Western Wall last Tuesday.

"We're here to show our support for Canada and Israel together," said Jesse Kaplan, a Canadian student studying at a yeshiva, who, with his friend Jeffrey Silver, was holding a huge Canadian flag. "We feel proud to be here today. Jews need to stand up more and show their support."

The march was the highlight of a week that saw a number of solidarity missions converge on Israel.

"We're here to show that Jews from around the world support Israel. It is in our hearts. We are here to show we do care," said Pearl Gladman, standing among the singing and dancing crowd in the Western Wall plaza.

The plaza in front of the Wall resembled a bar-mitzvah party, with live entertainers playing favourite Jewish folk dance tunes on a stage. From the Zion Gate parking lot, the participants walked down to the Wall, past a line of British students standing and singing on the ramparts of the Old City wall. Hand held signs read: "Unite with pride," "We love Israel," and "Students 4 Israel."

To the tune of "Oh When The Saints Go Marching In," they sang, "Oh When the Jews Come Marching In," ending the refrain with, "Oh how I want to be in that country."

The rally's sponsors were the Jewish Agency, which hosted delegates attending the institution's Board of Governor's meeting; the Canada-Israel Committee, which also represented 100 people affiliated with B'nai Brith Canada; the Canadian Jewish Congress; the Canadian Zionist Federation; the United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization of Jewish Federations across America; the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews; and a unity mission of more than a dozen organizations from the United States under the auspices of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the Jewish National Fund, and Israel Bonds.

"We're here in unity and solidarity," said Congress president Moshe Ronen. "Our message to Israel is clear: We are with you in solidarity to make peace and to secure the borders, to confront the violence Arafat has now chosen."

Asked if he thought peace could be attained, Ronen said: "It's up to Arafat. I think if Arafat wants to [show] he truly deserves his peace prize, then there can be peace. The Jewish people in general – especially in Israel – have always been eager to make peace, but it has to be with a partner we can trust."

"Jews have always lived with hope," said the B'nai Brith's Gladman. "We continue to live with the hope for peace."

Despite more than a month of clashes between Israelis and Palestinians, those gathered at the Wall plaza didn't seem frightened. "We're not afraid to be here," said Lawrence Hart, president of B'nai Brith Canada. "There's a crisis here and some people may perceive it is unsafe," but people should come now and "show their support."

As the group filed out of the plaza after hearing a speech by Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, some students of the Aish Hatorah Yeshiva held a large sign from the balcony saying, "Thank You For Coming."

The groups then met President Moshe Katsav, who thanked them for visiting Israel. "We are more united than at any other time of our past," Katsav said. "Our feeling is that you are behind us – we are one family. And because of that we can overcome the problems and challenges before us."

According to paramedic Eliyahu Zohari, soldiers turned the terrorist away from entering the main area of the market. The terrorist, who had more than 10 kilograms of explosives in his car, then turned around in a hurry and started towards town. Witnesses said police gave chase. The man turned up a side street and when blocked by a furniture van moving Ayelet Cohen into the neighbourhood, parked his car, set off the explosion, and ran away on foot.

Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the attack.

Olmert told reporters the Palestinian Authority was to blame because it had recently released Islamic militants from prison. "This was a PA attack. They released the Hamas prisoners and knew this would be the result," he said, angrily. "I'm not surprised, I'm outraged. We know they were released by the PA and motivated to do this."

In a statement released from the Prime Minister's Office after the attack, Barak reiterated Olmert's statements and said the market attack "is yet another serious, violent event that was forced on us and stems from loosening of the reins by the Palestinian Authority and the release of Hamas and Islamic Jihad prisoners."

Barak demanded that "the PA return to prison all prisoners it has released in recent weeks and return to fighting terrorism.

"Israel will continue to fight terrorism with full force; abhorrent attacks will not break Israel's spirit, stamina and determination to live in security and peace," Barak said.

"I'm afraid," said Friedland, 36, who two months ago immigrated from South Africa with his wife and child.

"It's very scary," said a store worker at Morano and Sons Nuts Store in the market. "It was expected. The attacks are expected everywhere, but this place is always hit. At any time it can happen again."

Earlier in the afternoon, Barak and Arafat had been scheduled to make separate announcements of a ceasefire. The announcements were postponed without explanation before the explosion. Barak issued his statement some four hours after the bomb attack.

Arafat's office issued a statement urging Palestinians to "stick to peaceful means" in protests against Israel, and later he told reporters in Gaza that Palestinians were "completely against" such attacks.

"Arafat has always wanted to go back to the peace process," Nabil Shaath, Palestinian minister of planning, told reporters. "He says this Israeli attack on us has to end first."

"The ceasefire is just an exercise, it's not real," Zohari, a paramedic at the bombing scene, told The CJN. "We believe this isn't the end, this is just the beginning. Arafat doesn't want peace; we're headed for a war. Arafat isn't a peace partner."

"There's no such thing as a cease-fire," said Shabtai Ya'akov, a fruit and vegetable stall owner who has worked in Machane Yehuda market for 46 years.

"Shimon Peres lives in a fantasy world, not me. I don't see a future with the Arabs."

Ya'akov said he has witnessed all of the bombings in the market since 1968.

"I've sort of got used to it. I have no choice," he said, his voice quivering.

An hour after the blast and with police still cleaning up the debris about 50 metres away from the main market area, Ramot resident Avraham Berger continued with his shopping.

"This is my home," he said. "Look, it is very frightening, very frightening. But this place is ours."

Asked about the prospects for peace, Berger said: "Not with Arafat, not with the Palestinians. You can't have it both ways: If you shoot and make bombs, there is no peace."

Ya'akov doesn't think there will be peace either. "People should never think that we [Israelis] started this war. We love our children, our soldiers – the Palestinians send their children to war. They say it is better to be a martyr than to stay alive."

But Zohari says there's no one who doesn't want peace in Israel: "I fought in the Yom Kippur War, my father fought in five wars. All we want is peace and quiet. The question is how do we get there."

Olmert wasn't optimistic the ceasefire would hold. "If a ceasefire can be reached I'll welcome it," he said. "But this agreement will likely be one of those violated by the Palestinians before it is even signed by them."

Mideast conflict hits the Internet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The ongoing conflict between Israel and the Palestinians has gone high-tech.

In Internet chat rooms, on a Web site devoted to selling goods, in countless e-mail messages and on Web sites belonging to the protagonists, the war between Israel and the Arabs has been taken to a new dimension.

For those who get lost in cyberspace, here's a brief (and incomplete) primer on some Internet activities:

• chat rooms, where participants exchange real time messages to people sharing similar interests, have seen the level of discourse deteriorate (assuming it was ever sophisticated) to one of crude insults and racial attacks, leaving good taste and respect far behind.

• e-mail messages, containing facts, arguments, Web links, videos, photos and cartoons focusing on the Middle East have been clogging up bandwidth, as people with an interest in the conflict trade information and forward files to numerous mail recipients.

• on the Web, Jewish and Arab hackers have attacked each others' sites in cyberspace.

• on eBay, an Internet auction site, a Lebanese/American woman purported to offer "Palestinian thrown rocks" at bids starting at $20.

The woman, claiming to be a schoolteacher, said she was motivated after one of her 15-year-old students was killed trying to throw a fire bomb at an Israeli checkpoint. "He was shot in the thigh and bled to death on the way to the hospital," she said.

Thinking it would be ironic "to turn those rocks into something to help the situation," she posted the rock sale on eBay, where it ran from Oct. 17 to 22.

Proceeds from the sale of rocks was supposed to support the Al-Hayatt medical relief effort and to keep boys in her school "from throwing their lives away in front of Israeli guns.

"If I have enough, I will pay every boy who stays at school instead of going to throw rocks," she stated.

"The boys are desperate to be 'men.' The boys are encouraged to throw rocks to draw out the soldiers, so that the soldiers can be shot at with guns. Once the Israeli soldiers start taking gunfire, it's the boys who are caught in the middle," she wrote.

Meanwhile, an "Internet shootout" is under way with Israeli and/or Jewish hacker attacks aimed at Palestinian, Hezbollah and other Arab sites while Arabs counterattack, targeting the sites of the Israeli army, foreign ministry, prime minister and Knesset, the Washington Post reported.

The Web site belonging to the Likud party was also hit with thousands of e-mails with such messages as "Death to the Jews" and "Hell is waiting for you."

Israeli hackers hit the Hezbollah Web site by placing an Israeli flag, Hebrew text and a recording of Haikvah, the Israeli national anthem, on the site's home page.

The Post reported that some Israelis attributed the cyber wars to "the work of bored teenagers spoiling for an antiseptic fight."

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —Why do some older people develop a positive attitude in life despite numerous hardships and tragedies while others are withdrawn or sink into depression?

The answer to this question is the subject of an unusual exhibition titled, Life Journeys: An Exploration Through Images and Thoughts created by Irene Borins Ash.

Ash is a consultant on aging, a photographer, tapestry artist and writer. The exhibition includes more than 40 photographs of vibrant and functioning elderly people from all walks of life and social positions.

"Despite differences in gender, race, cultural, socio-economic and religious backgrounds, there was a commonalty – graceful aging," says Borins.

The exhibition, which is sponsored by Central Park Lodges, also features a short written component consisting of a summary of the ideas that Borins' subjects shared with her during their interviews.

Irene Borins Ash

She gleaned that, "Some people develop wisdom through service to the community, others through close contact with family and friends, some found that spirituality had helped them age, while others are connected to their particular religious community."

The exhibition runs until Sunday, Dec. 3 at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre in the Koffler Loggia, 4588 Bathurst St.

Borins, 48, who has a degree in anthropology from York University and received a masters degree in social work from Yeshiva University, has worked at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Providence Centre, and as a consultant on aging.

She is planning to work with groups in retirement residences and nursing homes helping seniors develop a healthy attitude to aging.

"I photographed some of my clients because I like the faces of elderly people," she says. "I put these photos on a shelf for five years."

The thought for the current exhibition began many years ago when she says, "I was impressed by many seniors who were creative, had active minds and were still leading rich meaningful lives.

While working on a paper she presented at the Fourth Global Conference of the International Federation on Aging in September 1999, she decided to add a visual perspective to the presentation. "I wanted to add life to my presentation."

The response to her presentation was very gratifying. After the conference, Borins began photographing many seniors.

"I began meeting incredible people – successful professionals, someone with an intellectual disability, some with physical disabilities, a homeless man, and others who all had a positive attitude to life in spite of numerous trials and tribulations that life inevitably presents.

"I have attempted to capture the essence of the person's being," she explains. "I believe that the show has political, social and multi-cultural relevance to all people, young and old."

Some of the personalities in the exhibition include, Doris McCarthy, a 90-year-old artist who was made an officer of the Order of Canada, Rabbi Gunther Plaut, senior scholar at Holy Blossom Temple and a companion of the Order of Canada, and June Callwood, one of Canada's most respected journalists and broadcasters, author and an officer of the Order of Canada.

Also in the exhibition are Ed Mirvish, well known entrepreneur and an officer of the Order of Canada and companion to the British Empire, and Etta Ginsberg-McEwan, the past director of social work at Baycrest Centre, a writer, activist speaker and co-ordinator of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project. Ballet dancer, 22, to perform in two roles this month

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Despite suffering two herniated discs three years ago, Jerusalem-born ballet dancer Avinoam Silverman will be performing in two ballets this month.

On November 11, Silverman, 22, will take to the stage of The Hummingbird Centre for the Performing Arts as Prince Ivan, the lead, in the National Ballet of Canada's world premiere of James Kudelka's magical one-act production of The Firebird.

He is also set to debut as Espada the matador, in the company's staging of Don Quixote, based on Miguel de Cervantes' tale of chivalry and adventure, running from Nov. 15 to 19 also at The Hummingbird.

In 1999, Silverman's budding career was interrupted when a serious injury caused two herniated discs. Silverman ceased dancing for four months and with gruelling dedication to rehabilitation gradually returned to his art within 10 months.

For The Firebird, Silverman will be joined by 40 dancers who will weave a story in motion based on a Russian folk tale. Kudelka and collaborator Santo Loquasto, incorporate spectacular sets and costumes inspired by Mayan style and a sprinkling of other cultures intertwined.

"Dancing is a very interesting art form. It is a difficult job, but it can be satisfying when you achieve something that is demanding, both mentally and physically.

"I think this challenge is appealing to me. Everyday I have to shape my body and learn techniques, and in many ways it never gets easier," says Silverman, a member of the corps de ballet of the National Ballet of Canada since 1997.

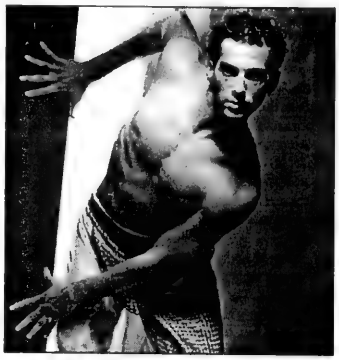
"I'm excited and nervous," he says about his upcoming major role. "I don't know if it really works, but I started to do a little bit of meditation to relax and get my mind focused.

"It can be difficult at times when there is turmoil in Israel and I'm in Canada. [I am] so far away and I can't take part in a situation that keeps changing. Sometimes, it affects my mood and makes it more difficult to focus on my rehearsal. I feel dancing takes me to a higher place, away from the harsh reality, where there are no guns or killing."

Silverman was into gymnastics until the age of 11, when he watched a jazz dance performance on television. He was smitten, and asked his mother if he could learn the craft. She suggested he learn the basics of ballet at a local school.

He continued his training in Jerusalem at The Rubin Academy of Music and Dance until he completed Grade 10. Knowing the English language, he wanted to study internationally, so he looked into schools in London, New York and Toronto.

"One of the directors of the Higher Rubin Academy, knew a teacher at the National Ballet School. This school was recommended because it had academic studies. I first came to the summer school and then got accepted into the school for grades 11 and 12," says Silverman.



Avinoam Silverman

"Eventually, I want to go back to Israel; I feel a very strong connection to my country. I want to give back what I've learned. I'm interested in choreography, maybe I will start a company of my own there."

To see Silverman in The Firebird, presented with Kudelka's The Four Seasons set to Vivaldi's baroque masterpiece, and in the full production of Don Quixote, call (416) 345-9595. Tickets are priced from $26 to $96 per show.

Solomon's love poem dramatized

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new dramatization of Song of Songs, Sholom Aleichem's novella about star-crossed lovers, is a unique way to maintain Jewish identity and continuity, says Nathan Garnick.

Song of Songs will be dramatized for the first time, in Yiddish and English. It was adapted by Garnick, whose love in retirement is literature, particularly Yiddish folklore. Garnick said he wrote and performs in the play as a labour of love.

Often compared to the story of the ill-fated lovers in Romeo and Juliet, Song of Songs (Shir Hashirim) is part of Jewish Book Fair week. It will be presented at the Leah Posluns Theatre Nov. 12, at 1 p.m. and 7 p.m.; admission is $5.

The novella, which was started in 1909 and serialized in the New York Yiddish daily The Forward, is based on King Solomon's passionate love poem to Shulamit, his favourite wife.

Garnick encourages those who don't know Yiddish to attend the two-hour dramatization, in which he uses English inserts to explain the plot.

The story takes place at the beginning of the 20th century. A young man trying to break out of the shtetl to live a wider life outside unintentionally loses the young woman he loves because she has to stay behind. Ultimately, he unwillingly pledges to marry another.

"Sholom Aleichem doesn't tell us in his ending what happens to Shimek and whether Buzie, his lover, goes ahead with her unwanted marriage," Garnick says.

"Most people who know Aleichem as a humourist will be pleasantly surprised at the beauty and passion of his poems in their original Yiddish," he says.

Garnick has rewritten the novella, a monologue by Shimek, the teenaged lover, to create a play with Shimek and three other characters – Buzie, the young woman, and her father and mother.

Garnick himself plays Shimek, and Jeannette Stein, an English teacher at Wilmington Public School in North York, is Buzie. David Newman, a linguist and translator in city courts, is the father; Faye Zeidman, a librarian in Vaughan, is the mother.

Nathan Rosen, at the piano, provides music to suggest the passage of time and connect the scenes. The music is based on compositions by Yiddish and Israeli artists, including Vladimir Heifetz, Sholom Secunda, A. Saphir and M.M. Varshavsky.

"Our sages and commentators of the Talmud stress that it is not merely a love poem... but a duet of love between God and the people of Israel, he says of the original Shir Hashirim. For that reason, it was at one time included in the Haggadah."

The presentation is co-sponsored by The Friends of Yiddish and the committee for Yiddish of UJA FEDERATION.

Klezmer trio backs Tova at concert

TORONTO — Fresh from her performance last week at the Leah Posluns Theatre, Theresa Tova is performing again, this time along with New York's Waletzky Trio.

While much has been said about the Toronto-based Yiddish diva – who will be singing from her debut CD at this performance – little is known about the Waletzky Trio.

The Trio includes composer/pianist Joshua Waletzky; virtuoso violinist Deborah Strauss and guitarist/mandolinist Jeff Warschauer.

Waletzky is a filmmaker and a major player in the klezmer revival. He directed the now-classic film on pre-war Jewish Poland, Image Before My Eyes and was one of the original members of Kapelye, a pioneering klezmer revival band.

Strauss, a member of the Chicago Klezmer Ensemble, is considered one of the finest practitioners of traditional Jewish violin style today. She's also worked with Brave Old World, Yiddish singer Adrienne Cooper and with the Klezmer Conservatory Band.

Warschauer is known as one of the foremost exponents of the klezmer mandolin, as a unique innovator in the development of the authentic klezmer guitar style, and as an expressive Yiddish CD. His solo CD, The Singing Waltz, has received widespread critical acclaim.

All three have worked on Itzhak Perlman's PBS special In The Fiddler's House.

The Trio will be performing selections from their debut CD Crossing The Shadows (Ariber Di Shotns).

The concert is Nov. 19, 8 p.m. at the Toronto Centre of the Arts, 5040 Yonge St. Tickets are available from TicketMaster 416-870-8000.

Famous siblings balance diverse cultures

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Last month, Jennifer Podemski, whose father is Jewish and mother is Saulteaux Indian, rocked the old Capital Theatre with 500 of her closest friends, at the launch of her new TV show, The Seventh Generation.

Podemski, 27, an award-winning TV and film actor (Riverdale, Dance me Outside, and The Rez) both co-produces and hosts the series, which features enterprising young native people from all walks of life.

Jennifer was 14, Tamara nine, and Sarah four, when their mother Joanna, left Ontario. Saul never remarried, devoting his life to his daughters and running his own marketing business.

"To me, Jenny conjures up a young version of Lucille Ball, Tamara is your classic middle child, and Sarah is definitely the social butterfly," says Saul.

"Raising them, I really never had any difficulties in terms of culture, religion or anything related to that. The difficulties had more to do with being a single parent. I know it's unusual for the father to be doing what I'm doing, but it boils down to simply being a single parent, regardless of gender."

Their mother Joanna, who was in town for the festivities, said that she had begun to learn Hebrew during her time with Saul. She lives in British Columbia with her second husband, and has been actively involved in native peoples' issues.

In an earlier interview, Saul and his daughters talked about growing up with a unique cultural balancing act. They had just attended a cousin's bar mitzvah, and their grandfather, a Holocaust survivor, dropped by.

Until she converted, says Jennifer, she did not feel totally accepted within the Jewish community. But when she goes to an aboriginal function, "I can't move for about two hours.

"I'm literally mobbed. It's a community that accepts me as an actor. I know about 11 other Aboriginal Jews who are also actors, so I don't feel all that isolated.

"I'm not saying that I'm representing every aboriginal person. I represent me. But I'm not actually alone; having sisters is a support group. And having a supportive family on both sides – they love me no matter what."

Sarah, who lived in Israel for a year, has performed on Goosebumps, a popular children's TV program. "For me, it was easy to have Jewish people in my life, growing up with a Jewish father. All my friends are Jewish. I'm the youngest, so it's hard to remember my mother's influence on me."

Tamara says that her fiancé Darrell is also a native person. "We're getting married, and we're going to be raising children. He's become a part of our family. In the native belief system they have a respect for traditions."

Tamara says,"These are generations who have survived…Whether it's the Jews, or the Indians…we are the survivors of all of those generations."

The Seventh Generation airs on APTN (The Aboriginal People's Television Network).

TORONTO — With its dedicated editorial team, impressive roster of contributors, and growing list of paid subscribers, Parchment, the self-styled journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing, shows every sign of becoming a permanent part of our cultural landscape as it enters its 10th year of existence.

The journal is fatter than ever. The 9th annual edition, whose launch is scheduled for Nov. 12 at 11 a.m. at the Bloor JCC, weighs in at more than 200 pages. The annual gets enough submissions that its editorial team is considering publishing it twice a year. They are also contemplating putting out a "best of" anthology to celebrate Parchment's 10th anniversary in 2001.

"People don't realize it, but there's a very high proportion of Jewish writers operating in Canada, more so than in the United States," exudes Parchment editor Adam Fuerstenberg, a professor of English at Ryerson.

"It's just that, in the States, the Saul Bellows and the Philip Roths get a lot of attention. When you think how small our community is, the high number of Jewish writers who have become part of the Canadian literary canon is just incredible."

The upcoming Parchment is dedicated to the late Toronto writer Matt Cohen, whose last novel, Elizabeth and After, won a Governor General's Award. For those attuned to the demi-monde of Canadian-Jewish letters, the issue will contain some interesting surprises.

For example, historian Gerald Tulchinsky has contributed a short story, and so has Ken Sherman, who is known chiefly in literary circles as a poet and critic.

New initiative seeks to make theatre more accessible to children

BY ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A new initiative encouraging children to experience live performance arts is being championed by two of the Jewish community's biggest proponents of the stage.

Theatre producer David Mirvish and celebrated Canadian actor Al Waxman have lent their support to the November launch of KidsNightOut.

The month-long program running February 2001 across Greater Toronto will allow children ages six to 18 to attend live performances free when accompanied by an adult at regular admission.

Waxman says the program provides a mutual benefit for children and local theatre alike.

"When I went to the Royal Alex as a child, I learned the magic of storytelling," said Waxman at the recent press conference and program launch at the Tarragon Theatre in Toronto.

"The theatre is always an attempt at storytelling, it does this more so than TV or movies. It is a magic, inspirational, experience that is truly uplifting."

Inspired by the New York outreach program Kids Night on Broadway, the KidsNightOut initiative seeks to enable 11,500 children to see live events for free – ranging from musical theatre, comedy, drama, classical and popular music, choral, and dance performance.

Undertaken by Arts & Communications of Toronto, the program currently spans 32 performance venues across the GTA, including Mirvish Productions, Roy Thomson Hall, Massey Hall, The Air Canada Centre, and The Pantages Theatre, amongst participating partners.

Tickets will be made available through event box offices, TicketMaster, and Ticket King. Information on the program will be made available through different mediums.

Following last week's release of the KidsNightOut program guide in the National Post, Starbucks Coffee will provide the guide through its locations until Nov. 15 in the GTA, and again in January. Other updates and additions will be available on the Internet at http://www. KidsNightOut.com.

Addressing David Mirvish's support for the program, Waxman said "David's love for story telling was a motivating factor, and because of him, other children will love it too."

Mirvish, unavailable to attend the conference, said in a press statement "I never anticipated that live theatre would play such a large role in my life, or be the link in my memory to so many meaningful occasions."

Attending corporate sponsors at the launch readily echoed Waxman's and Mirvish's sentiments in praise of the program's merits.

"The objective is to encourage children to come out who could not normally have the opportunity," said Ken McCord, senior vice-president of investment strategy and communications, AIM Funds Management Inc.

"What we are trying to do is build a long-term relationship with this generation. A lot of the program's success will depend on reaching out to parents, grandparents, and friends to insure continuing vitality of performing arts in Toronto."

KidsNightOut's major sponsor, McCord announced that AIM Funds will also establish the Young Audience Development Fund. Providing a $15,000 grant, the sister program will allow both youths and adults from Big Brothers of Greater Toronto, YWCA (Greater Toronto), and Boys and Girls Club (Downtown Toronto) to attend theatre for free. The program will run until December 2001.

Turning to scheduled KidsNightOut events in the Jewish Community, the North Toronto Players will perform Gilbert & Sullivan's musical Ruddygore at the Leah Posluns Theatre on Feb. 9th through 11th, and 16th through 18th. The public may call for ticket at 905-727-2209.

"Leah Posluns has been very supportive to bring this idea forward and I believe it will help strengthen our presence in the Jewish Community," said Ed Van Zaig, a member of the 35-year-old community theatre group from North York.

"This will also provide a great way to encourage children to see the works of Gilbert and Sullivan."

Nina Wright, Chair of Arts & Communications, said the company had investigated other potential Jewish outlets for the February schedule, but only the North Toronto Players fell into the program period. She says other qualified organizations interested in participating in the program may apply by Jan. 15th.

Another story comes from Zvi Harry Shuber, which translator Miriam Beckerman discovered in a forgotten anthology of Yiddish tales published three decades ago.

Other stories are supplied by Cynthia Holz and Norman Ravvin, both established writers with several books to their credit.

"We made the final selection of material last night," says Fuerstenberg, who worked on the final cut with prose editors Ruby Newman and Harriet Kravitz-Morris, and poetry editor Ruth Panofsky. "We thrashed it out and we settled on the last items."

Roughly one-third of the material submitted is good enough for publication, Fuerstenberg estimates. "It's amazing how often we agree. When you get something really good, there's no problem."

Contents of the new issue also include a segment of a play by young Toronto playwright Jonathan Garfinkle, a critical essay by U of T professor Michael Greenstein, a new poem by Malca Litovitz in honour of Israeli writer Aharon Appelfeld, and an interview with Appelfeld conducted by Newman and Kravitz-Morris.

"With some literary journals, a lot of disparate things get thrown together without a great sense of cohesiveness," says Kravitz-Morris, who lectures frequently to book clubs.

"There really is, in this case, a very strong community feeling to it. There's a sense that it is an intimate type of journal and that the contributors are bound together by common themes and, very often, a common language."

The members of the editorial team express delight that the journal attracts and showcases submissions by established writers. But they agree that Parchment is equally a forum for unpublished writers with talent. "We offer an opportunity for some young voices to be heard," says Newman. "It's often difficult for young writers to get published."

No new money needed to fix health care: panelist

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canada is doling out enough money for health care, but there is a better way of spending it, said the former head of Ontario's Health Services Restructuring Commission at a recent symposium.

"The idea that we're not spending enough money troubles me...We need to look at a better way of spending the money," said Peggy Leatt, now a professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto's department of health administration.

She spoke at the 37th annual André Aisenstadt Clinical Day held at the Jewish General Hospital, attended in large part by health-care professionals.

The original mandate of the Canada Health Act, which made health care accessible without charge to all Canadians, was to "ensure that all Canadians had a hospital bed," she said.

But since then, consumers' expectations have risen to include the belief that everything should be covered, Leatt said.

The health-care system should have a unified vision of where it is going and put the focus on primary patient care, but to date, she said, such a vision has not really existed.

The closest it has come to having a vision was at a meeting of Canada's first ministers earlier this year when they decided to distribute another $23.4 billion to the provinces for health care over the next five years, Leatt said.

At the time, the ministers' statement referred to the need for the health-care system to run in a cost effective and fair manner, the first time in Leatt's memory, she said, that such a term was used in the health-care equation, and the closest Canada has come to coming out with an actual vision.

Leatt said she was taken aback, however, that the media did not ask where the extra billions of dollars would actually be spent.

She said the problems with the health-care system include being fragmented, having a lack of accountability, and having too much emphasis on disease, instead of health.

These problems will not be solved by more technology, doctors, management or money, she said, but by adopting a truly integrated approach to health care.

An integrated system, she said, would provide a co-ordinated continuum, and could incorporate competitiveness into the health care equation.

Leatt cited six specific strategies based on the integrated model, which she said could be adopted by all the provinces.

They included more focus on the individual; making primary health care the priority; having more sharing of information (including ranking of hospitals and doctors); creating virtual networks that would focus on specific patient populations; and defining health care regions in terms of geographic or population boundaries in a much more precise way.

The experience in Ontario has been, in that regard, "appalling," she said.

The last strategy would be to monitor health services to make all levels of the system accountable.

Leatt's commission recommended a system-wide report card for Ontario that will likely be adopted by the provincial government, she said.

For all these changes to get under way, she said, the government must be willing to adopt the recommendations.

In the final analysis, however, the system will start moving forward by putting primary health-care at centre stage, and having health care consumers be an integral part of the public debate.

Leatt said that Canadians appreciate the fact that the Canada Health Act ensures universal access, comprehensive services, portability across the provinces, and the fact that it is publicly administered.

They also appreciate that health services in Canada rank very high compared to other developed nations, and that, generally, practitioners are dedicated and working in excellent health-care institutions.

Doctor's candid comments

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ten percent of all heart attack victims are misdiagnosed in the emergency ward and sent home, says Dr. Ian Blumer in his book, What Your Doctor Really Thinks (Dundurn Press, Toronto).

This is one of a series of comments the Ajax internist makes about his colleagues. He acknowledges that most have their patients' welfare at heart, but writes that the ability of humans to err is why "I think a lot of mistakes do indeed come from physicians' laziness, and, at times, downright incompetence."

In his book, subtitled Diagnosing the Doctor-Patient Relationship, Blumer advises patients not to have doctors who are friends.

He also says that too many doctors depend on drug company representatives for their information, adding that he never talks to them.

Blumer presents a series of case histories, asks the reader to suggest a diagnosis after he lists the symptoms, and then gives the correct answer and the reasons for it.

On the way, he drops a lot of incidental information such as: no one ever caught a cold from a draft; there is no such thing as a cold in the kidney; and the term rheumatism by itself is meaningless.

A lot of people don't appreciate that rheumatoid arthritis usually strikes only young people and the opposite is true of osteoarthritis, he writes.

At a family barbecue, he warns, putting the cooked hamburgers back on the same plate the raw meat was on is inviting bacteria to strike.

Blumer, who grew up in Montreal, advises doctors to sit down when they are talking to patients. "If you stand up, the patients thinks you are in a hurry to get away."

One of his instructors in medical school was so insensitive, Blumer says, that he pulled up the sheets covering a young woman, exposing her naked body, and a resident pulled the sheets back down, to the annoyance of the instructor. "I wish I had the courage at the time to do that," he writes.

Most doctors don't like it when a patient asks for a second opinion, he writes, and questions whether patients would do that if they had to pay for the second opinion.

As an internist, he has to depend on referrals from other doctors, he says, and so he is meticulous in going over the symptoms of the patients sent to him.

336 CARD OF THANKS

The Family of the late
would like to thank all our family, friends and patients for their kind support during our recent bereavement. Such an outpouring of love and prayers from so many has helped to ease the sense of sadness and loss, and has given us much comfort.
We are very grateful for your kind expressions of sympathy and generous donations honouring Bill's memory.
The Bell Family

The Family of
REV. ALEXANDER GOLDSTEIN
שמואל יצחק בן משה דוד ז"ל
Thank all our family and friends for your comfort, support and kindness at our time of grief. Your generous donations honouring our loving husband, father and grandfather, are gratefully appreciated.

From the Family of the late
MICHAEL (MEYER) ORZECH ז"ל
We wish to thank our family and friends for their kindness and support and for honouring Michael's (Meyer) memory with cards, donations to worthy causes and for being here for us in these very difficult times. It is gratefully appreciated.

Israeli swimmer sets world records at Paralympic Games

CJN News Services

SYDNEY, Australia — Israel may be an also-ran when it comes to the Olympic Games, but they're among the best in the world when in comes to competition at the Paralympics.

Last week, Israel finished 37th among 128 participating countries at the Paralympic Games in Sydney, Australia. Swimmer Keren Leibowitz led the Israeli team with three gold medals and three world records while other athletes snagged two silver medals and one bronze.

Leibowitz, 27, set world records in the 100-metre freestyle (1:10.25), the 50-metre freestyle (31.85) and the 100-metre backstroke (1:18.60) en route to her medal haul.

Zeev Glickman, 42, captured the silver in table tennis, defeating a German opponent by scores of 21:17, 14:21 and 21:17.

Doron Sheziri, a 33-year-old leg amputee, won a silver in shooting (rifle, prone position), scoring 691.1 points, half a point behind the Swedish gold medalist.

In other results, Izhar Cohen, a 38-year-old blind swimmer, took fourth place in the 50-metre freestyle event while Roni Bolotin, 44, a leg amputee, was ninth in the 100-metre butterfly.

Itzik Memistelov, who swims using one arm, set a world record of 1:12.18 in the heats for the 50-metre freestyle, but he tired in the finals and finished sixth, three seconds slower than his record time.

Leibowitz, like 25 of the 35 athletes on the Israeli team, is an Israel Defence Force (IDF) veteran. She suffered a back injury during an officer training course and despite several operations, she remains paralyzed in her lower limbs. Confined to a wheelchair, she was enjoying recreational swimming at the Beit Halochem facility in Tel Aviv when a trainer suggested she consider competitive swimming.

She took up his offer and since that time she's been top in her events. She told the Zahal (IDF) Disabled Veterans Magazine that she considers sports training a wonderful method of physical rehabilitation. Disabled athletes train as hard as able-bodied athletes and are at least as motivated, she said.

Leibowitz trains six to seven hours a day at Beit Halochem's Tel Aviv facility. Beit Halochem is a sports, rehabilitation and social centre for disabled IDF veterans and their families.

All Israel's medal-winners are members of Beit Halochem Tel Aviv.

Israeli athletes participated in 10 sports at the Sydney Paralympics: volleyball, swimming, sailing, shooting, table tennis, riding, athletics, power lifting, fencing and tennis.

"This is my first trip to the Games," Leibowitz said prior to the competition. "Aside from hoping to achieve my highest level yet, I know that I am representing Israel and that adds another dimension to the pressure and excitement that the event holds for me."

Hagai Zamir, a member of Israel's volleyball team, participated in his seventh Game. "In my opinion, it is a privilege and an honour," he said.

"We practice all year round. Our motivation stems primarily from the great pleasure to be derived from physical activities. The competitive aspect is merely added value. Of course, we all like to win and we are proud of our achievements at the international level as well."

Roni Bolotin, chair of the technical committee of the Israel Sports Association for the Disabled, the organization that co-ordinated the Israeli participation in Sydney, said the 2000 Paralympics marked the first time the government of Israel, through the ministry of science, culture and sport, funded the athletes' participation.

Israel boasts a long and successful history in the Paralympic Games. Israelis brought home 29 medals, including eight gold, from the first Games, held in Rome in 1960.

In 1968, Israeli hosted the Games and more than 800 athletes participated. Israelis won 61 medals, including 18 gold. Israel also won the year's Wheelchair Basketball Games World Championships in both the men's and women's categories.

Other highlights include a first place finish for the volleyball team in 1976 and a gold medal for the wheelchair basketball team at the 1980 World Championships in Holland.

The Paralympics in Sydney were the biggest disabled games yet with more than 4,000 athletes, 200 staff and 10,000 volunteers participating.

A Canadian group, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel – Beit Halochem, provides support and raises funds for the Israeli organization. It can be reached at 416-787-8950.

Maxie Berger remembered as one of boxing's immortals

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Boxer Max (Maxie) Berger, one of the most colourful figures in Canadian sports history, has died at age 83 after a decade of declining health.

Berger is remembered as one of those romantic, legendary sports figures who could have come straight out of Damon Runyan novel.

The Montrealer found success during the heyday of professional boxing in the 1930s and 1940s, starting out at the amateur level at the local YM-YWHA and winning a Canadian silver medal at the British Empire Games.

It was as a professional fighter, though, that Berger was widely renowned, meeting in the ring some of the most famous boxers in the United States.

He competed in well over 100 lightweight and welterweight pro fights, and became Canadian Welterweight Champion.

His first professional loss, in February 1942, came against then-welterweight up-and-comer Sugar Ray Robinson, an eventual boxing legend, before a crowd of 10,000 at Madison Square Garden in New York City.

According to a write-up on the fight in the Gazette, Robinson had his work cut out for him.

"Berger's first-round performance was just the style to match Ray's big guns," the newspaper account said. "Maxie danced around, made Ray miss a dozen times, and then countered with short lefts and an occasional right."

Berger went on to take on five other welterweight champions during his professional career, which ended in 1944.

Besides being inducted into the Y's sports Hall of Fame, Berger also joined the ranks of the Canadian Boxing Hall of Fame in 1982.

According to Berger's nephew, Sid Singer, his uncle was a guy who loved to live "in the fast lane" but never lost the common touch. He was a lover of life and man-about-town who never let fame go to his head.

Until his final years, Singer recalled, he could not accompany his uncle anywhere without him being recognized, his face an unmistakable pug's mug.

"You took one look at him, and you knew he had the face of a fighter," Singer said.

He was also a man, his nephew added, who was humble to the core, ready to engage anyone in conversation, but in general, reticent about his boxing career exploits.

"I couldn't go anywhere with him without being stopped," Singer said. "He would stop and talk to people. People just loved him. He was a very giving guy. There wasn't a mean bone in his body."

Few boxing fans are aware of it, but after his boxing career, Berger entered the custom-made shirt business and eventually embarked on a successful career as a stockbroker.

He was also involved in Jewish community endeavours, such as the Knights of Pythias and the now defunct Dalse Welfare Club.

Berger had no children, and was predeceased by his wife, Lucille.

He is survived by siblings Philip and Sally, and by many nieces and nephews.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I'm so disappointed! I've applied to four different clubs at my school, and I've been rejected by all of them. I've spoken to my teachers about it, but all they say is, "Oh well, there's always next time." I'm not sure how to overcome my frustration, and I really want to be in a club. Any suggestions?

Frustrated

Dear Frustrated,

Start your own club! It may seem like a pretty far-fetched idea, and it definitely takes guts, but it can really pay off. Think of something that you and some of your friends are interested in – pottery, jazz, writing, whatever – and form a group. Ask a teacher you like to help you get a classroom in which you can meet before or after school. Put up notices on bulletin boards. Make sure people know when and where your club meets.

And here's another suggestion: Don't make people apply! You don't want to be a source of frustration for other people. Make it known that your club is not exclusive and whoever wants can join.

If you don't want to start your own club, try looking around for clubs and extracurricular activities outside of your school. Look for activities that you don't have to apply for and that are specific to your interests. This will bring you outside the boundaries of school and will increase your choices.

If you're set on getting involved in something in school, you could bring in some of your skills from outside school. For example, let's say you really like painting. You could start making paintings that all follow a certain pattern or idea. It could be something people care about, such as the Earth, or a style, such as impressionism.

Once you've compiled a certain amount of your artwork, you could suggest to a teacher or your student council president that your school have an art exhibit with completely student-made artwork. You could organize it. Get other students involved. Ask them to submit some of their artwork and give each student a display case.

This would take a lot of organization on your part, but it could also be a lot of fun!

I hope these suggestions have been helpful and that you overcome your frustration. Good luck!

Karilani is actually three girls in high school. The drawing is a fiction. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Surging Women's Campaign Contributions

UJA FEDERATION's Women's Campaign & Advocacy (WC&A) has already raised $3.7 million toward Campaign 2001 - The Campaign For Our Children. That's about 15% ahead of last year at this time. More than 5000 gifts have been received to date. If the current campaign pace continues, Women's Campaign & Advocacy will contribute more than $4.5 million toward the overall campaign effort, which has now crossed the $31 million mark on its way to a record $45 million.

WC&A Chair Dodi Weill noted that the record rise in campaign gifts reinforces the excellent community response to the work of Women's Campaign & Advocacy. In establishing Jewish Women's Federation and Women's Campaign as a unified whole, Weill said "we have been able to involve more women and better convey who we are and what we do."

Uniting the best of two worlds

UJA FEDERATION WC&A embraces advocacy as a vital aspect of their mission and recognizes women's growing desire not only to raise funds but also to have an active voice in highlighting the issues supported by thoses funds.

"More and more in our community," said Advocacy Chair, Miri Schneiderman, "women personally confront the problems of poverty, abuse, health care, aging and divorce. To help them, we provide educational programming and access to proper resources."

As part of an awareness-raising initiative on hunger, Women's Campaign & Advocacy is producing simcha baskets - a charitable alternative to using strictly decorative centre-pieces for personal celebrations. "One way we have promoted this wonderful expression of tzedakah is through schools and parents' associations," Schneiderman said. The attractive baskets contain kosher food which is distributed by community agencies to families in need, following the simcha.

Miri Schneiderman displays popular simcha baskets.

Women Call for Kids

Women's Campaign & Advocacy was out in force to call for kids during last week's UJA FEDERATION telethons. Telethon Co-Chairs Susan Gudofsky and Frances Goldstein are proud of the results.

"Women are excellent at making the connection," Gudofsky said. "After all," she continued, "it's easy to talk passionately when we're calling for kids."

Many women, according to Gudofsky, go to great lengths to put in their telethon time. Veteran telethoner Joan London spent an hour and a half on public transit in order to participate, a commitment she undertakes every year.

Lion Luncheon is a roaring success

With 175 women in attendance, this year's Women's Campaign & Advocacy Lion of Judah Luncheon was larger than ever before. According to Luncheon Chairs Clara Cooper and Judith Finer-Freedman, "Lion of Judah donors share a special connection through their commitment to Israel and their sense of tzedakah and Jewish responsibility." Women who make individual annual contributions of at least $5000 to the UJA FEDERATION Campaign are part of the Lion of Judah division.

Luncheon speakers stressed the importance of a woman's gift to Campaign 2001 - The Campaign For Our Children. "Here in Toronto, each woman's gift helps a mother put food on the table or helps a child exposed to domestic violence," Finer-Freedman explained.

Solidarity strong as crisis continues

Ongoing efforts to strengthen ties between Toronto's Jewish community and an Israel in crisis increased last week. UJA FEDERATION Solidarity Mission participants arrived back in Canada last Thursday after a four-day support visit to Israel. During their stay, mission participants met Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and joined in a solidarity rally at the Western Wall with 1,000 representatives from other world-wide communities.

At UJA FEDERATION's Major Gifts Dinner this past Sunday, guest speaker Alan Dershowitz, one of North America's most renowned legal specialists, shared his perspective on the media response to the Israel situation. Israeli journalist and political commentator, Chaim Hecht, also provided insight into the conflict.

> "We need to fill the hotels and shops and show the world that we're unafraid, strong and united."
> Mission Participant Golda Brown

Last week, as well, Caroline Glick, who was Assistant Foreign Policy Advisor to former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, stressed the need for the Canadian government to take a proactive stand to neutralize the question of Palestinian "refugees" returning to Israel. Glick was speaking to the UJA FEDERATION Young Lawyers Network.

Jewish communities focus on Israel support

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

6,500 delegates at General Assembly

CHICAGO — Although planning for this year's General Assembly (GA) began over a year ago, its focus has shifted dramatically in the past six weeks to address the recent violence in Israel.

The 69th annual General Assembly of United Jewish Communities (UJC), the umbrella organization for 189 North American Jewish federations and 400 independent communities became "an expression of solidarity for and with the people of Israel," said Gail Hyman, UJC vice-president of public affairs, at a press briefing Sunday. Scheduled speakers were asked to rework their talks to address the situation in the Middle East.

Security for the five-day event (Nov. 10 to 14), held at the Hyatt Regency Hotel, was heightened in light of recent events in Israel, with a beefed-up police presence, including explosive-sniffing dogs, and restricted access to the Hyatt Regency Hotel, where the GA was held.

As The CJN went to press Monday morning, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak had arrived in Chicago following his meeting with U.S. President Bill Clinton. Barak was slated to speak that night to 6,500 delegates at the University of Illinois' 10,000-seat Chicago Pavilion. The event was to be a solidarity rally. Israeli Opposition leader Ariel Sharon was to speak Tuesday morning. (Coverage of both events will appear in next week's CJN).

Police were prepared for a demonstration by thousands of Arab protesters from across the United States.

The GA's official opening Sunday afternoon began with a moment of silence in memory of Leah Rabin, who died of cancer over the weekend. The widow of slain Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Leah Rabin was remembered at a press briefing by Rabbi Michael Melchior, minister of Israeli society and the world Jewish community, as "a fighter, somebody who stood with Yitzhak in the battles for the safety of Israel, for the peace of Israel."

Diaspora must respond

The Palestinian leadership has begun in earnest the battle to undermine the idea and the fact of Jewish Jerusalem. Mainstream Palestinian spokesmen now publicly question any historical link between the Jewish people, Jerusalem, the Temple Mount and the Kotel, even as extremist Palestinians question any link between the Jewish people and the land itself.

We in the Diaspora must ask of ourselves: What are our responsibilities as conscientious, committed Jews in this battle?

Editorial:
What are our responsibilities?

When Palestinian leaders challenge the Jewish right to Jerusalem as either a historical irrelevancy or a factual fabrication, are they not at the same time challenging the very essence of our Jewish identity too?

Is there any place on earth or any name on earth, other than Jerusalem, that more poignantly symbolizes Jewish peoplehood, Jewish identity, indeed the very essence of Judaism itself?

The News in Brief

CANADA

Suspects Remanded

TORONTO — Lawyers representing two youths charged in the beating death of Dmitri (Matti) Baranovski will appeal the decision to transfer them to adult court, according to Steven Fishbayn, a lawyer representing one of the 17-year-olds. Meantime, the two youths, along with Daniel Weiz, 20, will remain in custody until their next court date, Jan. 8. Weiz, recently extradited from Israel, and lawyers for the two youngsters appeared in court briefly last week, when the case was remanded to the new year.

Photo Exhibit

VANCOUVER — This city's Jewish and Greek communities have come together to stage a photo exhibit on their intertwined histories. Titled Portraits of Our Past: Greece and the Holocaust, the exhibit chronicles the fate of Greek Jews, 60,000 of whom were murdered in death camps. The display continues at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre until Dec. 14.

CCCJ Honorees

TORONTO — Former Ontario Lieutenant-Governor Henry "Hal" Jackman and financier Gerald Schwartz, chair and CEO of Onex Corp., will be the honorees at this year's Human Relations Awards Dinner of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, to take place Nov. 28 at the Royal York Hotel. The council recently voted to change its name to the Canadian Council to Promote Equality and Respect.

ISRAEL

Amir: No Regrets

JERUSALEM — Yitzhak Rabin's assassin said his only regret is that he did not kill the Israeli prime minister before the Oslo peace accords with the Palestinians were signed. Yigal Amir spoke to the media this month before a court hearing on the state's request to keep the right-wing nationalist, who assassinated Rabin on Nov. 4, 1995, separated from other prisoners.

Terrorist Freed

JERUSALEM — The man who tops Israel's most-wanted list of terrorists was released from a Palestinian jail last week, according to the self-rule government's police chief. Israeli security officials have warned that Mohammed Deif may already be planning terrorist attacks.

Righteous Kin

JERUSALEM — The children and grandchildren of non-Jews who helped rescue Jews during the Holocaust will be able to work in Israel for up to two years. Israel Radio reported that the decision by the interior ministry was taken after several descendants of Righteous Gentiles were detained in Israel as illegal workers.

Bent Out of Shape

JERUSALEM — A spoon-bending Israeli psychic is suing Nintendo for allegedly basing an evil Pokémon character after him. Uri Geller, who claims he can bend cutlery with his mind, is making the claim because a Pokémon character, Yun Geller, carries a spoon and gives his victims bad headaches.

WORLD

Shul Attacked

SYDNEY — Prayer shawls were set afire during an arson attack at a synagogue here. The Nov. 1 blaze at the Roscoe Street Shule was the most serious of at least three anti-Semitic incidents reported in Australia last week.

Cemetery Damaged

BUDAPEST — Vandals damaged more than 50 tombstones in Budapest's largest Jewish cemetery. Jewish leaders said they lack sufficient personnel to guard the cemetery.

Finland Sorry

HELSINKI — Finland has apologized to the country's Jewish community for extraditing eight Jews to Nazi Germany during World War II. Prime Minister Paavo Lipponen made the apology at a commemoration here marking the 58th anniversary of the event.

French Lash Out

PARIS — France's prime minister has criticized a U.S. court's decision to hear a lawsuit filed by American Holocaust survivors against French banks. Speaking last week to French Jewish leaders, Lionel Jospin said the decision could delay France's efforts to make full restitution for wartime assets taken from Jews during World War II.

Royal Visit

LONDON — Queen Elizabeth visited a Jewish man stabbed on a bus in London in mid-October in an incident believed to be related to the violence in the Middle East. An Algerian man is charged with attempted murder in the attack on David Myers, 20, who was stabbed more than 20 times. Myers is recovering at home.

Jewish Representation Increases

WASHINGTON — The Jewish presence in the United States Congress will increase slightly as a result of last week's elections, despite the loss of at least one Senate seat and the upset defeat of a longtime Jewish representative, Democrat Sam Gejdenson of Connecticut.

Jews will hold at least nine seats in the new Senate, a drop from 11.

Two Jewish senators up for re-election and both won: Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Herbert Kohl (D-Wisc.).

In the House of Representatives, the number of Jews serving will increase, from 23 to at least 27 – and possibly as many as 29. Two races where Jewish challengers threatened incumbents were still too close to call as of The CJN's deadline.

As well, there are four new Jewish members of the House of Representatives, one each from Virginia and New York, and two from California.

Gray put on hot seat at CJC meeting

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Come, let us reason together," said Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, quoting from the prophet Isaiah, at a meeting organized by Canadian Jewish Congress last week.

Election 2000
For further coverage, please see pages 22–26

The meeting, at which all the federal parties had an opportunity to express their views, was highly critical of Gray for the Liberals' support of the UN resolution criticizing Israel, and for their lack of action on the funding of Jewish schools.

Gray pointed out that Canada's relations with Israel have been good, and that Israel considers Canada a friend. Otherwise, he said, Israel would not have asked Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to intervene with Arab nations on behalf of Israel, as Chrétien has already done.

Gray also left the door open for further aid to families who send their children to Jewish schools. He promised to take up the funding issue again with the cabinet as soon as the election ends.

"I can't honestly say anything more than that," he said. "We have three weeks to go until the election."

Unlike in the United States, Canada cannot constitutionally enforce decisions of the UN, such as the one saying Ontario is discriminating by funding Catholic schools but not other religion-based schools. The pressure should be maintained on the Ontario government to grant equal funding, Gray said.

Robert Goldin, the Alliance party candidate in Thornhill, was applauded when he promised that his party, if elected, would put the equivalent of $6,250 in the pockets of Jewish school families through income tax credits.

Like Gray, David Berlin, the NDP candidate in Rosedale riding, reminded the audience that Canada has long had a positive relationship with Israel. He was roundly booed when he defended the UN resolution, saying it was intended to warn Israel not to forget that it had the world's fourth largest military force.

Berlin said his father helped establish Israel, and that at the age of 18, he himself was in the Israeli army.

Progressive Conservative leader Joe Clark would have insisted on more temperate language in the UN resolution criticizing Israel, said party spokesperson Paul McCrossan. He also said Chrétien should have opposed the UN resolution, and he was critical of Gray for not speaking out.

At a press conference prior to the meeting, CJC national president Moshe Ronen referred to Chrétien's letter to Jewish leaders, in which Chrétien expressed regret for the distress Canada's stand on the UN resolution caused in the Jewish community. The letter, which was published the day before the meeting, was a "positive development," Ronen said.

"The Liberal government knows that the Jewish people feel betrayed and we will follow its policy closely."

But nothing will loosen the bonds between the people of Israel and Canadians, Ronen added.

"The CJC does not endorse any candidate and the Jewish people do not vote as a bloc," he said. "We will make the right decision when we go into the polling booth."

Chrétien's letter was also discussed at the meeting, where Goldin called it "an insult, not an apology."

Another topic raised at the meeting was Alliance leader Stockwell Day's record. Berlin charged that Day has shown he is anti-Semitic, a charge that Goldin branded as "lies."

Goldin said Ernst Zundel, James Keegstra and Doug Christie were admitted to Alliance party membership because

To the Negev and Dead Sea

From the editor's desk

Last week, as a guest of El Al Airlines and the Israeli Ministry of Tourism, I spent four days touring Israel. This article is the first in a three-part series that will describe some of the highlights from that visit.

Eli Gertler, a 25-year veteran of the army, is my tour guide. At age 58, he still volunteers. He is one of the people in the Jerusalem area whom the army calls upon to personally notify a family when one of its own is killed in the line of duty. He has character.

On the first day of my tour, we travel south from Jerusalem towards the Negev along newly paved roads. Within moments, as we leave the Judaean hills, we are in a new landscape, surrounded by new colours, enveloped by new silences.

We are heading to the Dead Sea. The area is primarily used today just as it was in the days of King Solomon: as a resort and spa.

Our first stop is at the Ahava cosmetics factory where the company's world-renowned products are sold at significant discounts. The rich revivifying minerals extracted from the soupy calcium, potassium, bromine mix of the Dead Sea are converted by Ahava into a variety of extremely popular cosmetic and corporeal creams.

We check in for an overnight stay at the Crowne Plaza Hotel, the impressive, white, 14-storey hotel that hugs the Dead Sea shoreline. The hotel is hopping with visitors, a combination of Israelis taking advantage of the sudden spate of room vacancies and Scandinavian and German tourists for whom the salt water and other spa treatments are partially underwritten by their respective national health insurance plans.

Ami Baleshnikov, of Arad, four years out of the army, is the director of the hotel's public relations department. Over a sumptuous all-you-can-eat lunch in the lounge overlooking the pool and the shoreline of the Dead Sea, he speaks about the need for other Jews to visit Israel now. "It gives a great deal of encouragement to the people who live here. It lessens the feeling of distance between us."

After lunch, Eli and I join Aharon Somekh, an expert desert guide, for an off-the-beaten-track hike by jeep deep into the fabulous rock formations of the Negev Desert. Somekh is a direct descendant of the famous Iraqi scholar, posek (a person who renders halachic judgment) Abdullah ben Abraham Somekh. His deep brown face has the dry, grooved, leathery texture typical of someone who has spent a great deal of time in the sun.

In the Negev, the wind erodes the sedimentary rock like fingers pushing through soft potter's clay. It is a haunting artwork of irregular shapes, sculptures of rock-hard sand worn down by time, raised up by the human spirit. The sand, beige and brown of the sculptures stand out against the vast heavenly tableau of the ubiquitous pale blue of the sky.

All around us we see fantastical shapes carved into and out of the desert by the timeless wind. Here we see a mini-sphinx, there a hand folded in in a position of prayer, here a huge mushroom, there a growling guard dog.

We drive directly to the highest point in the Sdom area, a topographical apex known as the Nekudat Hatrig, a name borrowed from the language and formations of geometry. We look eastwards toward the low-lying red mountain range that lies along Jordan's western border on the far side of the Dead Sea.

From the Trig Point we travel along the rocky, narrow corridors between the wind-scraped rocks and gigantic sandy sediments to the famous Flour Cave, whose walls are finely powdered into a white dust that resembles flour.

After nearly an hour in the jeep, we stop in mid-track in the moon-landscape corridor of the wadi for a tea break. With the jeep's engine turned off, we immediately feel the silence of the desert, the silence of the mountains and the silence of the sky.

The tea is sweet and poured into small glasses. It is flavoured with Louiza, a green leafy plant indigenous to the area and acclaimed for its comforting, restorative qualities.

With the going down of the sun, the colours of the rock and sand begin to change to darker reds and browns and coppers. The water of the Dead Sea becomes more vivid as well.

We return to the hotel and say l'hitra'ot to Aharon. It is time now to relax and wash away the desert dust. I prepare for a hot mud "treatment."

Tatiana, a friendly, newly-arrived immigrant from Kiev, shmears layers and layers of hot mud all over my bathing-suit clad body, from my fingers to my toes. She wraps me in plastic sheeting, then covers the plastic sheeting with a heavy woolen blanket. The mud against my skin is very warm. The point of the exercise, she explains, is to enable the rich minerals to enter my body.

She leaves me for 20 minutes wrapped up tightly like a fish in newspaper, covered in Dead Sea mud. She returns, unwraps me and I clean off the mud under the refreshing, cleansing spray of a hot shower. The resulting sensation tingles and feels good. I'm told too that it is even therapeutic.

Israel 'under siege,' says West Bank mayor

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The crisis in Israel has leaked beyond the Palestinian-controlled areas and has struck at the heart of the country, says a leading Israeli politician.

The entire nation "is under siege," says Ron Nachman, mayor of the West Bank city of Ariel and a hardline Likud member of the Knesset. "That feeling is not unique to rural areas. It's the same in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. It's the same feeling all over Israel."

Fewer people drive at night and Israelis in large centres are afraid, Nachman told The CJN after addressing community leaders during a whirlwind visit last week.

"For the first time, there is no Green Line," said Nachman, referring to the so-called pre-1967 border. "The whole land of Israel has become one frontier. There is no West Bank or occupied territories. The Bedouins in the Negev and the Arabs in the Galilee demand autonomy in Israel proper. There is no difference between what's going on in Israel proper and the territories."

Israelis, he said, are getting fed up with what they view as the West's double standard when it comes to putting down the violence.

"People say if such incidents occur in Washington or Paris or London, the governments in those countries would have [reacted] very strongly against that violence."

In the meantime, the 17,000 residents of Ariel, located 40 kilometres east of Tel Aviv and 70 kilometers north of Jerusalem, are trying to live with as little disruption as possible.

"The mood is that they continue daily life. Sixty percent [of residents] commute to Tel Aviv every day, so the safety and security of the road to Tel Aviv is the most important thing."

Nachman, 58, was the first volunteer mayor of Ariel when it was founded as a hilltop settlement in 1978. In 1985, he was elected mayor, and in 1992, elected as a Likud MK, representing the hardline views of Jewish settlers in Judea and Samaria.

The city describes itself on its Web site as the capital of Samaria. Today, half its residents are immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

But as far as Nachman is concerned, the Oslo accords with the Palestinians are "dead. [They] have brought Israel back to 1948. Snipers shoot at Jerusalem, and not from walls of the Old City. There are suicide bombs in the heart of Jerusalem. Jaffa became a place of rioting. The concept of land for peace has collapsed.

"No Arab government ever gave the Palestinians 95 percent of Gaza or 40 percent of Judea and Samaria. But the Israeli government did it. [Now], they have 95 percent of the land, and we have 100 percent of the bombs."

The 1993 Oslo accords also allowed the arming of 50,000 Palestinian police officers and security forces. It's not surprising, Nachman said, that those weapons are now being used against Israelis.

The first step toward a solution is economic, Nachman believes. He's calling for a $10 billion infusion from oil-rich Gulf states to develop the northern Sinai, now part of Egypt. That, he explained, would generate jobs for Gazans.

Nachman also wants Arab countries to invest $1 billion a year for 10 years to develop the infrastructure in Palestinian-controlled areas.

Until the violence stops, however, there will be no talks with the Palestinians. "Unless it is quiet, there is no negotiation between us and them. That it is the first step that should be taken."

Nachman is speaking to Jewish communities in North America "to strengthen the Jewish people here, because they are frustrated and confused. They don't [hear] a clear voice coming from Israel. Because of the success of [Prime Minister Ehud] Barak's government in uniting the Arabic and Islamic world for the first time since 1948, this has stopped being a problem of the West Bank or Israel itself. It became a problem for all Jewry."

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED

Tel Aide: The Jewish Distress Line is looking for more telephone volunteers. If you can spare three hours a week, consider joining the Tel-Aide family. Training provided. 636-9610.

Male and female volunteers are needed by the Bernard Betel Centre in North York for weekly visits to blind or homebound seniors whose caregivers desperately need a break. No physical care is involved. If desired, friends can volunteer together as a team. Transportation costs are reimbursed. Please call Paula Mintzberg, Respite Services co-ordinator, at 225-2122, ext. 118.

The Toronto Public Library in the Don Mills/Eglinton area offers a Leading to Reading program for children from grades 2-6. Adult volunteers meet one-to-one with a child on either a Tuesday or Thursday evening or on the weekend. The requirement is only two hours per week on an ongoing basis. Call the Volunteer Centre of Toronto-North York branch at 631-6117.

Visit an isolated person who may have mild dementia or depression and who would benefit from your visit and activities such as reminiscing, walking, having coffee together. Professional support is provided to each volunteer. Both men and women volunteers are needed. Areas: Toronto, North York, Thornhill, Richmond Hill. Tanenbaums donate $100M art collection to ROM

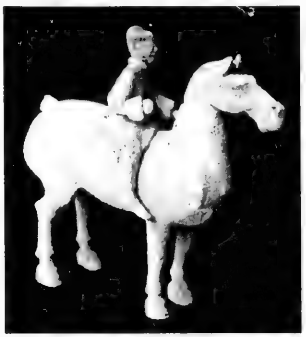
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Philanthropists Joey and Toby Tanenbaum have donated their $100 million collection of Asian and Middle Eastern art to the Royal Ontario Museum.



Rider on Horseback, China, 2nd century BCE.

The donation, worth $104 million, is a milestone in philanthropy in Canada, being the largest single gift to a cultural institution in Canadian history.

The Tanenbaum Collection of Chinese and Near Eastern Antiquities con-sists of 1,800 pieces, of which about two-thirds are Chinese artifacts, said Francisco Alvarez, the ROM's media relations manager.

"This wonderful collection will further cement the ROM's position as one of the world's leading museums in the area of Chinese art and archeology," said William Thorsell, its president and chief executive officer.

Joey Tanenbaum, head of Jay-M Enterprises Ltd and a member of the Order of Canada, is the grandson of Abraham Tanenbaum, who immigrated to Canada in 1911 from a shtetl in Poland with only a few dollars in his pocket.

Tanenbaum's father, the real estate developer Max Tanenbaum, arrived in Canada some three years later.

At a ceremony in which the Tanenbaums turned over their collection to the ROM, Joey Tanenbaum said: "We wanted to say thank you to Canada for welcoming my grandparents, my father and my uncle to this country. This (donation) is a true symbol of our heartfelt thanks to this great country of Canada."

He restored the Junction synagogue in the western part of the city. He plays a leadership role in local Chabad projects, and donated a recreation centre to Kfar Chad in Israel. He endowed a chair at Ben Gurion University of the Negev, and heads up the Canadian Friends for the Israel Museum.

The collection the Tanenbaums bestowed on the ROM consists mainly of sculptures, ceramics and bronze objects.

"The Chinese objects are particularly remarkable for their aesthetic quality and workmanship, filling in important geographic and historical gaps in the ROM's world-renowned collections," said Hans Sues, the museum's vice-president of collections and research.

The Chinese portion of the collection, dating from the Neolithic period through the Tang dynasty, is made up of about 1,000 items.

Alvarez said that the ROM is investigating the origin and history of the Tanenbaum collection in light of media reports about its authenticity.

"This will take several months. If any problems are encountered, we will work with the relevant authorities to determine the best course of action, in accordance with national and international laws.

"No pieces will be accessioned by the ROM if experts are not completely satisfied. At this time, we have no reason to believe that any of the pieces are suspect. These concerns were the opinion of a single dealer, who was misquoted in the press.

"The ROM is confident about the value and provenance of the large majority of the collection. Should there be any questions raised concerning the provenance of individual objects, then we will not accession the object in question into the collection. This is fully understood and agreed to by Mr. Tanenbaum."

Alvarez also said that artifacts in the collection will start arriving at the ROM later this month.

The Tananbaums have been ROM benefactors for many years now.

Tanenbaum is also chair of the Art Gallery of Ontario and the Canadian Opera Company.

Are Jewish prayers not filled with yearning for the rebuilding of, and the return to, both the idealized and the actualized Jerusalem? Are the writings of the prophets not replete with recurring references to Jerusalem? Are the pages of our liturgy, our prose, our poetry, our philosophy, our history and our laws not tied together by their references to Jerusalem?

Who and what we are as Jews stems from the internalization of "Jerusalem" into the Jewish psyche and soul across the span of generations and 3000 years. Let it also not be forgotten that who we are as Canadians stems from our identity as Jews, the spiritual, religious, ethical, monotheistic inheritance - our Jerusalem legacy, as it were - that inspires us as Canadians to strive for the advancement of the world.

Thus, in contemplating our responsibility to our fellow Jews in Israel at this moment in Jewish history, we come face to face with the questions: What do we stand for as Jews? What do we mean when we say we are Jewish?

Shall we say we are Jews yet do nothing when the Jewish right to Jerusalem is scoffed at and derided? Shall we allow the last word about Jerusalem to be left to the haters of Jews?

If our Jewishness means anything, if our sense of peoplehood means anything, we in the Diaspora must respond to the current situation. And there is much we can and must do -

- for the sake of other smaller, Diaspora communities, especially in Europe, who may feel particularly vulnerable;
- for the sake of our own local community dealing with unfriendly or hostile media, problematic government policies and uninformed co-religionists;
- for the sake of Israel, whose Jews bear the physical brunt of what amounts to an existential assault on all Jews; and
- ultimately, of course, in so doing, for the sake of ourselves as individuals.

Last week The CJN received a letter from former Winnepeger Linda Segal in which she opened her heart to her Diaspora co-religionists. "With all of our problems, it is clear that the lack of tourism is a serious complication. Now more than ever Israel needs the physical support of the Diaspora Jews…You can go to many places, and we do need your presence. We need you to fill the coffee shops, buy the items that fill the shops, stay in the hotels…and to reach out and talk to us. The economy is suffering badly. Things have been bad in the past, and we have survived. We shall survive this time. But now is that time for all Jews to stand together…and so I ask of you, please come and visit."

We in the Diaspora can and must respond to this moment by trying to heed Segal's plea. Israel needs us. Equally true, we need Israel.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Name park after Trudeau

In respect to the recent death of Pierre Elliott Trudeau, I think the greatest honour that could be bestowed on him would be to change the name of Mount Royal Park to Pierre Elliott Trudeau Mount Royal Park. It is here where he lived and walked with friends. We (the members of the Wolf Pack running group) used to meet him there and exchange greetings. He was a citizen of Canada and a native of Montreal and this is a mountain that millions of people visit every year from all over Canada and the world. People will remember him. There is a Remembrance Road on the mountain, and Mount Royal is a much more appropriate place to bear Trudeau's name than Mount Logan or any other mountain. We have a Camilien Houde Road, so why not a Pierre Elliott Trudeau as part of the Mount Royal Park name.

Trudeau not a friend

The Liberals' record towards Jews and Israel is horrible. Canada had the worst record among all countries of accepting Jewish refugees during World War II. After the war, some Nazis found it easy to get here. Trudeau was never our friend, and we are pretending that he was. I don't want to mention all the UN resolutions where Canada sided with the most anti-Israeli countries. And we still keep talking nicely about the Liberals!

Now it's our time to unite and say "no" and vote for Stockwell Day, showing our displeasure with the current and former Liberal governments.

Share the land?

The Bible tells us that Abraham regarded Ishmael as his son in every sense of the word. What does every father (or mother) tell children who are quarelling over possession of an object. The recommendation is universal and timeless. "Share, and stop fighting right now."

I feel certain that if Avraham avinu reappeared today, his advice to Ishmael and Isaac would be just that.

Don't yell fire!

I agree with Marc Sidlor (CJN, Letter to the editor, Oct. 19), that Ariel Sharon "had a right to visit the Temple Mount" and that the violence had already begun by the time Sharon took his walk. But it is simply foolish to imply that Sharon's visit had nothing to do with the resulting despicable aggression by Palestinians on those who were davening erev Rosh Hashanah, erev Shabbat at the Kotel and which then escalated the pre-existing violence.

There are times to walk and times to use common sense and stay home. Sharon was deliberately being provocative. As the great jurist Learned Hand wrote in connection with the constitutional right to speak freely in the United States many years ago: freedom of speech does not give anyone the right to shout out "Fire!" in a crowded theatre.

Gray always community supporter

I'm sure that I was not the only one surprised by Marvin Taylor's letter to the editor ("Not Surprised," CJN, Nov. 9) accusing Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray of being one of "those among us who would sell their Jewish souls in order to maintain power." Those who objectively examine Gray's career since he entered politics in 1962 will find that he has always been an honest fighter in the cause of social justice. Those who are familiar with his involvement in Jewish communal affairs know that Gray has always played an active and supportive role within the Canadian Jewish community.

One may disagree with Gray's politics without attacking his character in such a shameful manner. There are those among us who need to look within their Jewish souls.

Perhaps MPP didn't understand

Having personally witnessed the recent pro-Palestinian rally in Toronto, I was offended by the presence there of MPP Peter Kormos.

He is of course entitled to lend his support to any cause which he deems fit. Nevertheless, chants of "slaughter the Jews," (albeit in Arabic), comparisons of Israel with Nazism and the spewing of hate and anger which was evident at this gathering, including the burning of the flag of a sovereign nation, make me wonder about his judgment.

Perhaps he did not understand what was going on.

The plain truth of the current conflict

By DONALD CARR

My wife and I were in Israel for nearly four weeks immediately following Rosh Hashanah. During that period, the worst of the Palestinian uprisings occurred – called by Yasser Arafat the "Al-Aksa intifadah" – as well as short-lived riots by Israeli Arabs in several parts of Israel.

Rocks were thrown a block and a half away from our son's home in Ramot, Jerusalem. Our daughter-in-law and our three grandchildren had to sleep over with us at our apartment the night before Kol Nidrei. A pipe bomb exploded on Dubnow Street, in the heart of West Jerusalem, close to the Jerusalem Theatre and five minutes from our apartment. The Machane Yehuda outrage followed.

From the experiences of September and October 2000, I have some random thoughts and facts, many of the latter being new to me.

While visiting Gilo, which was attacked virtually every night (and some days) by gunfire from Beit Jala across the valley, Stephanie Nolan, the Globe and Mail's reporter, approached us to introduce herself when she learned that we were from Toronto. She agreed with us that the situation was "terrible." (We were standing on the road overlooking Beit Jala while the Israelis were erecting a concrete wall in a futile attempt to shelter the exposed inhabitants of that Jerusalem district.)

Ignoring the Arab attacks, she bemoaned the fate of Palestinian children with gunshot wounds whom she had recently seen in hospital. She was told that those wounds would not have occurred if the children had not been sent by their parents and their schools to be in the slingshot/molotov cocktail front-line firing on the Israelis behind the Tanzim, illegally armed gunners; and that their children are taught to hate Israelis almost with their mothers' milk and, certainly, in their textbooks (partially paid for by Canadian monies). She responded that she had heard of Jewish children expressing hatred for the Palestinians, too.

When asked where she was living, she said she lived in Ramallah for the past two years. Ramallah! That Palestinian Authority-controlled city seething with hate, where two luckless Israeli reservists were literally torn apart by the barbaric hordes a few days after we spoke to her!

On my return to Toronto, I discovered that this "observer," who is living with Israel's mortal enemies, formerly worked for the Jerusalem Media Communications Centre, run by Ghassan Khatib, providing "information" for Palestinian journalists!

Despite the horrendous violence, not once has Israel ceased to transfer between 30 million and 50 million shekels a month to the Palestinian Authority (PA). Why? Because this was part of the Oslo accords and subsequent subsidiary agreements. This is on top of the millions of cubic metres of water provided each year and the supply of electricity to the PA. Israel continues to live up to its commitments, however surreal that may appear.

Arafat and his subordinates keep referring to "Christian towns" such as Bethlehem. Bethlehem's Christian character became history many years ago, as Muslim Arabs moved in and became the majority.

Although it is now probably academic, the late Golda Meir's repeated statements that there is no Palestinian people were given a boost by Arab-American writer, Joseph Farah, who wrote a pointed column called Myths of the Middle East that appeared on his Web site, www.worldnetdaily.com, and was reprinted in the Jerusalem Post. The column exposed the myth of a distinction between Arabs who live under the PA and those who live elsewhere in the Arab states, which comprise 99.9 percent of Middle East lands.

Snipers from Beit Jala, the hillside village to the north of Gilo, fire at Gilo residents.

He followed this piece with another called More Myths of the Middle East, this time debunking the claim made by Sheik Ikrama Sabrih, the PA's top Muslim figure in Jerusalem – and repeated recently by Arafat himself – that the Western Wall has no religious significance to the Jews and is, in fact, known as al Buraq, the name of the horse with which Mohammed ascended to heaven from Jerusalem.

And speaking of Arafat, who is no Palestinian but was born in Egypt, a real revelation about his history is to be found in a well-written book published in London by Bloomsbury in 1998, called Arafat: From Defender to Dictator, by Palestinian Said R. Aburish. No lover of Israel, Aburish recounts the story of Arafat's youth and his ascendency to the leadership of the PA. In that history, details are given about the agreements (written and oral) Arafat made successively with Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, not one of which he honoured, resulting in his expulsion from all three countries. Anyone who reads this treatise must ask how the Israelis could even dream that Arafat would keep any bargain made by him with them, after what he did with his own Arab "allies."

It was staggering to learn from the president of the French Jewish community whom we met in Jerusalem, that there are six million Arabs living in France – about 10 percent of the total population. No wonder more than half of the ugly manifestations of anti-Semitism around the globe occurred in France!

In a recent poll cited by the Arab affairs expert Dan Pattir, 70 percent of Israeli Arabs said they sympathize with the PA. Yet 64 percent of them prefer to live in Israel rather than in an Arab (Palestinian) state! Younger Israeli Arabs have taken to calling themselves "Palestinian Israelis." The PA has infiltrated the Israeli Arabs and fed the short-lived revolts with all kinds of incitement. This is in addition to the constant incitement in Arabic on the PA airwaves and television.

Why, oh why, do Palestinian Arab children willingly invite death by throwing lethal rocks and molotov cocktails from the front lines at Israeli Defence Force checkpoints? Egged on by parents and school teachers, they crave to become martyrs for Allah. What right-thinking parent not only permits this but encourages it? The $2,000 US paid by the PLO to the families for each Shihad (a Palestinian who dies in conflict with Israel) may have something to do with it. Two thousand dollars goes a very long way in a large family with little or no income.

Where are the Axworthy-led Canadians who so strongly voiced their opposition to the use of children's armies throughout the world – except in PA-controlled lands?

Forty-six retired U.S. generals and admirals signed a half-page advertisement in the Jerusalem Post, praising the IDF for "remarkable restraint" and condemning the perversion of military ethics of Palestinian "military commanders" who place armed adults amid civilian rioters, including children, and then callously use the inevitable casualties as grist for their propaganda mill. The signatories included former inspectors general of the U.S. air force and army, the former chief of staff of the supreme headquarters of the Allied forces Europe, the commander of the U.S. Atlantic fleet, chief of naval operations, the chief of staff of Allied forces southern Europe and many other significant former leaders of the U.S. armed forces.

And now my thoughts on the real basis for what is going on today.

This is no battle between Palestinians and Israelis for a piece or pieces of territory, even the Temple Mount. Upon Arafat's return from Camp David and Sharm al-Sheikh, he was greeted by signs proclaiming him the modern day Saladin. Saladin, revered by Middle Eastern Muslims, was the one credited with ridding the area of the Crusaders and spreading Islam through much of the Middle East, North Africa and parts of Europe. Indeed, Arafat does see himself as Saladin. He sees himself as the leader of a holy war. And it is quite true. This is a holy war between those I choose to call "Islamists" and the entire Western World.

As in history, the Jews, represented now by the Israelis but threatened in words and deeds throughout the world, are the first to be attacked, in much the same way as Jews were only the first targets of the Nazis. By "Islamists," I do not mean the religion of Islam, nor many of its adherents. I mean those who are on the fundamentalist wing, typified by Iran, Hezbollah and the jihad groups. The trouble is that the West does not realize this – or, if it does realize it, wishes to avoid the issue, whether blinded by oil or by a prospect just too horrible to take into account. Governments of Israel, too, have been unwilling to either recognize this truth or to give it voice.

A former consul general of Israel in Toronto – a superb intellect, well-versed in Arabic and in Muslim thought – told us that he did not believe there were any real prospects for peace as we know it, until the world of Islam itself reconciles the problems between those on the extremist wing and those who would have Islam come into the 21st century. His pessimistic view is that such a reconciliation may take hundreds of years. However, until that takes place, the Arab world will not countenance the "cancer" of a non-Islamic, Jewish state in the heart of the territory they consider their own. And so the likelihood of a lasting peace is remote.

Pessimistic? Maybe realistic! While one hopes that such an analysis is incorrect, perhaps the immediate future is destined, at best, to yield extensive periods where there will be "no war," but rather "cold peace" (such as that which exists with Egypt and even Jordan), interspersed by suicide-like attacks from the "Islamists."

Tragic as that may be, it is just as tragic that Western countries are not prepared to realize that the opponents of Israel have an entirely different world view from that which exists in the Western mind, and that the problems of the Middle East have to be looked at quite differently from problems that exist in the world as we know it, different from the attitudes and relationships that are the hallmark of Western democracies.

A splendid event

The media unfortunately have many opportunities to report on mishaps, desecrations of ceremonies and sundry anti-Semitic occurrences. All too rarely do occasions arise when we can say that they are harbingers of better days.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

One such event, called Sounds of Healing, will take place – of all cities – in Nuremberg, Germany, which is often identified with Nazism at its worst. But at the end of November, the Nuremberg Symphony Orchestra will perform the Kaddish symphony of Leonard Bernstein, together with 200 Jewish singers from Canada, the United States and Israel.

The performance is meant as a memorial to all those who died in World War II and, as the advance program indicates, "to reconsecrate the grounds where the famed Nuremberg rallies were held and replace them with the spirit of brotherhood and understanding."

The concert will be a highlight in the 950th anniversary celebrations of the city and the opening of a new museum that will feature Nuremberg's malevolent role during the war.

The concert date also happens to be the 10th anniversary of Bernstein's death.

A film will chronicle not only the musical event and its preparations, but also the great cultural history of the city, and will deal with the rebirth of its Jewish community. It is thus an observance that, while not overlooking the dark days of Nuremberg's history, will celebrate its beneficial highlights as well.

The infamous Julius Streicher, probably the worst of all the Nazi anti-Semites, who was executed after the Nuremberg trial, would turn over in his grave if he could hear the sounds of Bernstein's Kaddish.

The names of the participants will give you some indication of their ecumenical and international scope: The Los Angeles Zimryah Chorale, the Choral Society of Southern California, the Beverly Hills Presbyterian Church Chancel Choir, El Camino Real High School Camerata, the Tel Aviv Chamber Choir, the Efroni Children's Choir (also from Israel); and from Canada, the Lachan Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir, which has 24 voices specializing in a Canadian Jewish repertoire and is conducted by Benjamin Z. Maissner, cantor of Holy Blossom Temple.

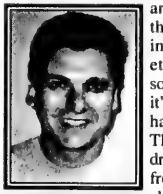
The orchestra will be the Nuremberg Symphony Orchestra, which made its first appearance in 1945, just two months after the end of the war. It has, over the years, attracted important guest artists and performed both in Germany and abroad.

The objective is indeed important: to truly make "sounds of healing." Nuremberg is the city where the Nazi party disenfranchised every German Jew in November 1935, an act which, at the time, made me a stateless person.

Sixty-five years later, this musical happening will be a landmark in reminding us both of the horrors of the past and the promise of the present.

Israel still feels like home

About a month ago, soon after the conflict with the Palestinians erupted, a longtime close friend from Canada sent me an e-mail. He expressed his concern for the safety of my family because of the escalating violence in Israel and suggested we come to Toronto to stay in his home out of harm's way.



Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

His offer was as kind as it was sincere but it threw me just the same. Even in the worst moments of the current crisis, it never entered my mind to seek refuge abroad. Tourists may cancel plans to visit Israel, and foreign students and diplomats' dependents may flee the country, but not Israelis. I thanked my friend for his thoughtful invitation, explaining to him that if we were all to accept such offers, there would be no more Israel.

In recent weeks, other friends from abroad have asked me if the present situation had not led me to reassess my decision to live in Israel. Some felt I should perhaps consider a move back to the tranquil, more lucrative shores of Canada, where I grew up, or at least to Europe, from which I immigrated to Jerusalem in 1990.

Understandably, to people overseas bombarded with a constant stream of horrifying TV images of intense violence, life in Israel sometimes seems at best unsettling, if not outright death-defying. Without trying to minimize the gravity of circumstances now, the reality is never quite as bad as it looks on CNN.

On one level, despite the tensions, life continues in its daily routine, as it must. On another level, there's no escaping the situation. Few people are immune from the heightened anxieties and fears over security. In a society where news is so pervasive, it's impossible to fully filter out the harsh reality, even for children. They quickly pick up the sense of drama and unrest from their parents, from the media and at school. Less clear is how traumatic it is for them.

Living in Jerusalem can leave one more on edge, especially now as the Palestinians have taken direct aim at the capital, literally. In our case, we live so close to the embattled neighbourhood of Gilo that each time the army sends in huge helicopter gunships at night following Palestinian attacks from nearby Beit Jala, the sky erupts above our home, spooking our children.

Amid warnings that Palestinians are preparing new attacks, people curtail plans, often avoiding public places that are prime targets for terrorists. The recent car bomb near the city's main outdoor market served as a murderous reminder, if one was really needed, of what we're up against. With Hamas and Islamic Jihad spewing frequent threats, many people try to avoid buses, shopping centres and other such sites hit by terrorists in the past. But in the end, short of staying inside sequestered at home, you resign yourself to not knowing where danger lurks.

The other day, I rode my bicycle to an outdoor café in central Jerusalem to meet my wife for coffee. I parked my bike beside the café's terrace. Not even two minutes after we sat down, a man at another table began asking in a loud, urgent voice if the unattended bike belonged to anyone at the café. His concern: that it might be laden with explosives. I immediately owned up to my bike and he breathed a sigh of relief. Given the prevailing tensions and jittery nerves, there was nothing extraordinary about his behaviour.

This is part of our reality. It's neither simple nor without sadness and certainly not ideal – which is what people told me life would be like here when I first considered moving to Israel.

A few weeks ago, as I marked the 10th anniversary of my aliyah, I told my wife that despite the current troubles, I still felt we made the right move for our family when we left France for Israel in the fall of 1990. For all the rough episodes the country has been through since then, I wouldn't trade Israel for anywhere else in the world. No other place feels so much like home.

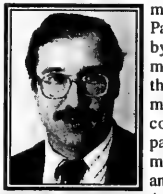
Teaching children to hate

While the Arab propaganda machines promote the myth that the war against Israel is a "spontaneous popular uprising," this is a carefully planned affair. In addition to training the snipers and setting terrorists loose, Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority made sure that extra food and other essentials were ordered in advance. They also rehearsed the media campaign with great care, so that the same lines (and lies) are recited daily and ad nauseam on television, on radio and in the newspapers.



Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Most significantly, the Palestinian leadership prepared the population with hatred for Israel. The official television and radio churn out a steady diet of odium directed against Israelis and "the Jews." In the mosques, the imams appointed by the Palestinian Authority exhort the faithful to "Have no mercy on the Jews, no matter where they are in any country. Fight them wherever you are."

Children play an important role in the war against Israel, providing the first phalanx that provides cover for the fire-bombs and snipers. These children, who are brought by their parents from one confrontation to another, are the cannon fodder for the Palestinian propaganda machine. Every child "martyr" is another great victory for the cause, leading to condemnations of Israel for the use of "excessive force" and for violations of human rights.

The indoctrination of Palestinian children to hatred extends beyond the television programs and military-style summer camps. The new textbooks, written after the Oslo agreement and the establishment of the Palestinian Authority, were financed by a number of apparently well-meaning democratic countries with the goal of advancing peace and mutual acceptance. Instead, they continue and reinforce the campaign of indoctrination and incitement, including a heavy dose of anti-Semitism that has propelled the Arab-Israeli conflict for generations. Fifth graders read that "this is our story with the thieving conquerors. You must know... that Palestine is your holy responsibility and that of your generation. Life will not be good until we return there." For homework, they are asked to answer questions such as: "Why must we fight the Jews and drive them out of our land?"

From the earliest days of the conflict, the Palestinians and most of the Arab and Islamic world have refused to confront the reality of Zionism and the deep and ancient Jewish connection to the Land of Israel, and, in particular, to Jerusalem. (In contrast, Israeli intellectuals, educators and leaders acknowledge Palestinian attachments to the land, and this has been reflected in the acceptance of "two state" solutions, beginning in 1947.)

This wilful ignorance and mythology is also reinforced by the Palestinian Authority's educational system. In Grade 10, the students learn that: "The Zionists turn[ed] their attention towards Palestine as the national homeland of the Jews, relying on false historical and religious claims." Grade 8 textbooks teach children that: "The al-Buraq wall is the southwestern wall of Al-Aksa Mosque... The Jews claim that this is one of the places belonging to them and call it 'The Wailing Wall,' but this is not so." (In fact, Jews call this the Western Wall of the Temple Mount. The term Wailing Wall is used by non-Jews.)

This systematic ignorance and hatred are reinforced by repetition of the long-standing Palestinian rejection of Israel, regardless of borders. Arabic language texts include a map of "Palestine" from the Mediterranean to the Jordan River, without any mention of Israel. These maps have not been changed for 50 years, and the real lesson is that as far as the Palestinians are concerned, Oslo and the "peace process" were never serious.

As this evidence clearly shows that, for Palestinians and much of the Arab and Islamic world, peace is still an empty word. At the same time, the world's eager peace-makers share much of the blame for failing to create a culture of tolerance in the schools, the mosques and the media. Peace will come only when the Palestinian and Arab hatred and rejection of the Jewish people's strong links to the land of Israel and to Jerusalem are finally replaced by tolerance and understanding.

The Kirshner File

Vatican should open its wartime archives, says scholar

As far as Michael Marrus is concerned, the onus rests on the Vatican. "The ball is in the Vatican's court," he said briskly the other day. "I'm not sure where we go from here."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Marrus, a University of Toronto professor and dean of its School of Graduate Studies, was commenting on a report released recently by a historians' panel concerning the role of the Vatican and that of Pope Pius XII during the Holocaust. The panel, of which he is a member, was established in 1999 to review 11 volumes of documents on this extremely touchy topic published by the Vatican between 1965 to 1981.

The panel, consisting of three Jewish and three Catholic members, was jointly selected by the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews and the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations.

Charged with the task of raising issues that had not been satisfactorily resolved by the existing documentation, they released a preliminary report on Oct. 26 suggesting that the Vatican documents they had studied had "not put to rest significant questions" regarding "the actions of (Pope) Pius XII and the Vatican during World War II."

Adding that they had highlighted important issues that are still unanswered, the panellists challenged the Vatican by posing 47 questions of their own and requesting access to archival material from 1939 to 1945. At present, scholars have access to archives only up to the year 1922.

"We anticipate that documentation will be forthcoming, and we look forward to the development of an expeditious process that will enable us to continue our work," the panellists wrote. "It seems to us that the search for truth, wherever it may lead, can best be promoted in an environment in which there is full access to archival documentation and other historical evidence. Ultimately, openness is the best policy for a mature and balanced assessment."

Several days after the report was released, Marrus invited me to his office on the campus of the U of T to discuss it. "Our sense was that we could only add value to the process if we could promote more openness," he explained. "In the absence of greater archival access, polemics are inevitable. My own sense is that it is in all our interests to have this kind of access."

To the best of his knowledge, the Vatican has begun making preparations to open the archives of Pope Pius XI, Pope Pius XII's predecessor. This would take the story up to February 1939, but not to the crucial wartime era, when the Holocaust was already underway.

Marrus, whose books include The Holocaust in History and Vichy France and the Jews, strongly believes that he and his fellow panellists should convince the Vatican to open all archives connected with the war.

"It wouldn't be useful to withdraw at this point," said Marrus, who on Nov. 13 was officially named Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Professor of Holocaust Studies at the U of T. "As a general rule, the case for openness has to made again and again, though it is self-evident. We want these archives made public to us and other scholars."

In their official report, Marrus and his colleagues argue that untrammelled access "would be a very significant step forward in advancing knowledge of the period and enhancing relations between the Jewish and Catholic communities."

When I wondered whether, in fact, the Holy See will accede to their request, he replied: "We don't know if the Vatican will let us continue. We await their answer." Asked when he expected a response, he said, "I don't know."

Marrus acknowledged that some elements in the Vatican, presumably liberals, are in favour of full disclosure, while others, in the conservative camp, oppose the concept of transparency. He is not sure where the current pope, John Paul II, stands on this matter.

Michael Marrus

Having been exposed to the Vatican on a firsthand basis, Marrus learned that it is not a monolithic institution."It's not right to say that the church speaks with one voice. There are many voices. The Vatican is a lively place."

During the course of their investigation, the panellists met in New York City, London, Baltimore and Rome. Among the Vatican officials to whom they spoke were Cardinal Edward Cassidy, president of its Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, and Archbishop Jorge Mejia, head of the Vatican archives. They also held discusions with Cardinal Pio Laghi, who commissioned the nearly one dozen volumes they analyzed, and Father Peter Gumpel, the priest in charge of Pope Pius XII's proposed beatification.

Pius XII, of course, is an extremely controversial figure, all the more so since the publication of Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII by John Cornwell. According to Cornwell, Pius XII was an anti-Semite who maintained a scandalous silence about the fate of European Jews during the war. [See mini book review below].

In his work, The Holocaust in History, Marrus writes that while Pius XII was aware of the Holocaust, he refused to issue "explicit denunciations of the murder of Jews or call upon the Nazis directly to stop the killing."

Pius XII, he noted, was first and foremost interested in preserving the strength and prestige of the Vatican at a time of chaos and instability. As a result, he hewed to a policy of impartiality toward the Allies and Axis powers. "For him, the ability of the church to function was of supreme importance. Jews hardly appeared on his radar screen," he said.

Reluctant to openly denounce Nazi crimes against humanity, he overestimated the Vatican's diplomatic clout and underestimated the demonic nature of Adolf Hitler's regime.

Since Pope Pius XII figures quite prominently in their report, they posed a number of questions about him, some of which were:

- Did he respond to a 1940 plea by a Swiss bishop expressing grave concern about the horrible conditions of Jews in French concentration camps?
- Did he approve of appeals by the papal nuncio in Romania to limit deportations of Jews planned for the summer of 1942?
- Did he hold discussions about the mass murder of Jews in Ukraine after receiving an impassioned letter to that effect from the Greek Catholic metropolitan in Lviv?
- Did he allude to the fate of Jews in Poland in correspondence with the Archbishop of Krakow in 1942?
- Did he raise the subject of anti-Jewish and anti-Serb atrocities in Croatia during two meetings with Croatian fascist leader Ante Pavelic in 1941 and 1943?
- Did he try to save Jews in Berlin from deportation in 1943?
- Did he react to reports from the Vatican's representative in Budapest in 1944 that Hungarian Jews were to be "resettled"?

Marrus contends that these and other probing questions are prompted by a "fair reading" of documents published by the Vatican so far. But is the Holy See ready to take the next big step and open up its wartime archives to scrutiny? It will certainly be a litmus test of the Vatican's sincerity, its commitment to the unvarnished truth and its relationship with Jews.

Uneven record

Eugenio Pacelli, otherwise known as Pope Pius XII, compiled a decidedly uneven record on Nazi Germany and the Holocaust, writes John Cornwell in his hard-hitting book, Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII [Penguin Books].

Although the pope maintained a deafening silence with respect to Nazi Germany's persecution of Jews, he tried to protect Jewish converts. In the summer of 1938, he commissioned an encyclical on Nazi racism and anti-Semitism, but never released it. Nor did he condemn Kristallnacht.

After receiving reliable information in 1942 about the Holocaust, he denounced the Final Solution, but only in the vaguest of terms. In another telling commentary, the pope refused to endorse an Allied declaration censuring the persecution of Jews.

The pope, however, was not entirely heartless. In 1944, he asked the pro-German Hungarian government to use its influence "to stop the suffering and torments which countless people are undergoing simply because of their nationality or their race." And, as Cornwell points out, the Vatican saved thousands of Jews in Hungary by finding hiding places for them.

On balance, though, the Vatican could have done far, far more.

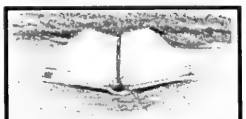
By RABBI BARRY GELMAN

I am talking to you

I recently had the opportunity to address a group of people on issues of Jewish continuity. I was part of a panel of four who were sharing various ideas about how to assure Jewish continuity. No one there thought they had all the answers; we were simply sharing some of our own experiences and suggestions.



While many of the ideas presented were valuable and in fact crucial, I would like to relate a comment that was made to me following the question and answer period.

A woman approached me and said: "Rabbi, I have an idea of how you can get them more involved."

Folks, I had never felt so dejected in my entire career. Why? you ask. After all, this person was only trying to help. Perhaps, but I latched on to one word in the statement that sent me reeling – "them." Apparently, after sitting through one hour of brainstorming about what we all could do, this person never once felt that the comments applied to her.

The image that immediately appeared in my head was of people listening to what was being said, looking around them and saying to themselves: "He is not talking to me. Sounds interesting, but it is not for me."

Allow me to let you in on a little rabbinic secret (I trust my colleagues will not mind). When we (rabbis) speak to an audience, we are speaking to everyone.

The reason this comment was particularly depressing was because of the context. Jewish continuity is not a task that is the responsibility of one group. Sure, we often think it is the young people we have to "look after," but that response leads to some very negative consequences.

Take the bar/bat mitzvah experience. As parents we send our children to their lessons and classes. We dutifully drop them off and pick them up. I maintain that it is infinitely more important and will leave a greater mark on our children if they see us not only as their bar/bat chauffeur, but as spiritually preparing for their bar/bat ourselves. Wouldn't we send a beautiful message to our children if we told them that in honour of their bar/bat mitzvah we were going to enrol in an adult education class?

The truth is that Jewish continuity is not about "them;" it is about you and me and the messages we send. There is no easy way to send "them" the message of the importance of Judaism.

I have learned from interviewing countless couples about to be married that they will choose to live the same Jewish life that their parents have lived. If we study Jewishly, our children will do the same. If we attend synagogue, our children will do the same. If we observe the mitzvot, our children will do the same. If we are enthusiastic about Judaism, our children will be as well.

There is a beautiful midrash referring to matan Torah (the giving of the Torah at Sinai); it explains that every person at Sinai heard the Torah in a way that appealed to them. The young, the old, men and women, each was addressed in a fashion that spoke to him or her, that made everyone feel that God was talking directly to him or her.

As rabbis, we have to do our best to speak in language that is "hearable" to all. While we do not have the divine power to inject our message into the soul of each individual, it is our responsibility to make our points meaningful, relevant and inspirational.

On the other hand, perhaps the midrash also teaches us that the people who stood at Sinai were able to spiritually ingest God's word because they went into the experience understanding that God was speaking to them.

Personally, I think it is a combination of both. Rabbis, teachers and parents must communicate their messages clearly and with enthusiasm to pique the interest of the listeners. Those listening must come with the attitude that he or she is talking to me.

That combination can only bring success.

The nature of Zionism

Political analyst Michael Ignatieff once noted that its enemies think of Zionism as an ideology, but its friends know that it is an argument. The significance of this remark should not be missed.

It would be a disservice to those wishing to understand Israel and its complexities if the full range of thought regarding its existence and purpose were kept underground, blanketed by a cover of political correctness.

Contained within the final chapters of sefer Bamidbar are God's instructions regarding what will be the necessary sequence of events for taking possession of Israel: "When you cross over the Jordan into the Land of Canaan, you shall dispossess all the inhabitants of the land before you … for I have given you the land to possess it" (Numbers 33).

Some interpret the above verses as clear evidence that the Torah demands forceful dispossession of non-Jewish populaces that reside in the land, while others limit its application only to the idolatrous inhabitants of the biblical era.

Rashi offers a plain understanding: "If you drive out the inhabitants, then you shall inherit the land, and if you do not, then you will not be able to exist in it." The Italian exegete Rav Ovadiah Sforno adds that if you do not eliminate the inhabitants of the land, then "even though you will conquer the land you will not be privileged to hand it down to your children."

Such comments were staples in the arsenal of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, who was explicit in his belief that not only should every inch of Israel be in Jewish hands, but that only a complete expulsion of the Arab populace would guarantee the biblical promise of a Jewish homeland. He bitterly castigated all those whom he believed avoided this interpretation: "That is Judaism, and if it be painful to the western secularized Jew because of its all-too-obvious contradiction of western secularized democracy, so be it. It is necessary that we rid ourselves of the … evasions and fraud of terrified Jews."

And yet, way at the other end of the spectrum was the fiercely idiosyncratic cry of the Israeli writer Yeshayahu Leibowitz, who died in 1994. As far back as 1968, Leibowitz called for a total withdrawal from the "territories," and had a stinging rebuke for those who would see a religious imperative behind their annexation: "Counterfeit religion identifies national interests with the service of God and imputes to the state – which is only an instrument serving human needs – supreme value from a religious standpoint. The 'halachic' reasons for remaining in control of the territories are ridiculous, since the state of Israel does not acknowledge the authority of the Torah and the majority of its Jewish inhabitants reject the imperative demands of its mitzvot."

The public discourse surrounding Israel, especially in times of crisis, prefers to avoid or suppress such uncomfortable ideological extremes. And yet they are an important signal as to the parameters of the problem.

Ironically, Leibowitz and Kahane both recognize the same inherent difficulty in a Jewish state wedded to a secular democratic framework. Put another way, the situation as it currently stands is intolerable, and may not be something that negotiations, even if sincere, can solve. The only question is what to do about it, a question that fills the heart with fear and foreboding.

Israeli radio stations

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Two Israelis – three opinions.

OK, so there aren't quite as many Israeli radio stations as there are Israelis but you will find a gigantic variety of content on Israeli radio which you can listen to on your computer. Today from religious to rock to talk.

But let's start with a station that doesn't exist any more. One of the most famous radio stations in Israel's history didn't actually broadcast from Israel but "from somewhere in the Mediterranean."

The Voice of Peace was a "pirate" radio station which operated without a licence from the State of Israel. It was the brainchild of peace activist Abie Nathan and for 20 years broadcast a unique blend of politics and popular music.

The ship made its home six miles off the coast of Tel Aviv – still within the territorial waters of Israel until it closed down in 1994. You can find a fascinating history of the station at [http://www.geocities.com/Broadway/5383/index.html]. You can find more on Israel's other colourful pirate and offshore radio stations at the Offshore Stations of Israel [http://www.guernsey.net/~bebridel/israel.html] and at Jim Parkes' offshore site [http://homepage.ntlworld.com/jim.parkes/radio_news.htm].

Arutz 7 (Channel 7) [http://www.a7.org/] also started as a pirate ship broadcasting from offshore. It now provides what it calls an alternative to Israel's "liberal-left controlled electronic media."

Its mostly Hebrew-language programming is a mix of traditional Jewish and Israeli music, religious teachings, its own newscasts and news from Kol Israel. Taped programming in English can be heard at [http://www.a7.org/english/radio/recorded/Frecorded.htm] and live programming at [http://www.a7.org/english/radio/live/Flive.htm].

One of the most popular radio stations in Israel is Galei Tzahal [http://glz.msn.co.il/], the radio station operated by the Israel Defence Forces [http://www.idf.il/]. The station presents a wide mix of programming for news, interviews, traffic and music [http://192.114.179.11:8080/glz/glz.asx]. I found this one of the more frustrating Israeli stations on the web since the signal would often come in very clearly and then just stop.

Don't just listen to Radio bu99FM, peek into its studio, too [http://www.bu99fm.co.il/]. The rock radio station has a camera mounted on the studio ceiling so you can see the host sitting in his chair and watch him as he's announcing the show [http://www.video.net.il/video99.asx]. The station focuses on music and other features geared toward younger listeners.

102FM Radio Tel Aviv sounds like a station with attitude [http://www.102fm.co.il/]. The music is loud, the talk is quick and the Internet site is almost empty. However, there is a working link to the station's live signal [http://www.102fm.co.il/live/live102.ram]. Please note that while listening in, I heard some English-language songs with some very explicit lyrics.

On the other side of the dial, figuratively, you'll find Radio Kolchai, 93FM, is a religious radio station that offers a mix of Jewish music and "news from the Jewish world." [http://kolchai.moreshet.co.il/]. In addition, there are programs about Halachah, rabbis' sermons and programs geared toward consumers and youth. The site is completely in Hebrew. I found the broadcast quality clear but it had to be restarted every couple of minutes [http://kolchai.moreshet.co.il/play/93fm.asx].

Radio 10 also calls itself the Positive Jewish Communications Network [http://www.radio10.co.il/default-e.htm]. The station's live and taped programming originates mainly from Yeshivat Or Hachaim and from other Yeshivot in Jerusalem. In addition to an on-and-off feed of their radio signal [http://212.179.32.3/LiveRadio.asx] there are also speeches by Rabbi Ovadia Yosef and Rabbi Reuven Elbaz.

Next time, we wrap up with Jewish radio programming from around the world and some Israeli radio stations that you'll only hear on the Internet.

A biography of Saul Bellow

Bellow – A Biography*, by James Atlas
Random House $53.00

Some years ago, the Sunday Times of London put this question to a group of Britain's leading writers and critics; "Who is the greatest novelist writing in English?"

Saul Bellow came out far ahead of any of his literary competitors. Indeed, Bellow, perhaps the most revered and often enigmatic literary figure of the last half-century, is America's premier novelist.

Books
Bernard Baskin

It is hard to name many other American writers who over four decades have written first-rate and enduring books. During this period, Bellow has published 12 novels, two collections of short stories, several plays and numerous essays and articles.

He has come to his eminence, not through the mechanics of publicity, self-advertisement or sensationalism, but through slowly building up a body of work, that with each new novel has displayed greater range, solidity, penetration and brilliance.

Bellow always knew he wanted to be a writer and persevered in the face of enormous contrary pressures. His family didn't take him seriously and he had to struggle unremittingly for success and recognition.

James Atlas, a prominent editor, biographer and journalist, spent 10 years writing this definitive biography. There is little about his subject that escapes the author's encyclopedic attention. In addition to a detailed examination of all aspects of Bellow's life, he also analyses each of his major works, the events surrounding its creation and its critical reception.

After four unsuccessful marriages, Bellow was forced to acknowledge his shortcomings as a husband. He fathered three sons by three different wives. But he tried again in 1989 when he married Janis Freedman of Toronto. His friends were outraged. The groom was 74 and the bride only 31. But despite widespread misgivings, the marriage has lasted for over 11 years, and at 84, Bellow became the proud father of a daughter.

However vehemently he maintained that he was an American writer who happened to be a Jew, Bellow identified strongly and publicly with the fate of his people. Israel evoked in him profound feelings of identification. What could be called the Jewish sensibility – nomadic, Yiddish speaking, steeped in irony and a consciousness of history – was second nature to him. In that sense, Bellow, despite his protestations, was a Jew who happened to be an American writer.

To Jerusalem and Back (1976), a lengthy foray into nonfiction was a highly sophisticated depiction of the political situation in the Middle East. It received largely favourable reviews. His view was to create a Palestinian state on the West Bank, "a state that recognizes the interdependence of the contemporary world."

Ravelstein, Bellow's most recent novel is his most Jewish. The two main characters "brood fraternally on Jewish history, Jewish soul, the fate of Israel, and the survival of the Jewish people, despite Hitler's efforts to wipe them off the map."

Some critics have castigated Bellow for his personality defects. But, certainly, the bottom line is not whether Bellow is a good person, but whether he is a good writer; not whether he pleases his friends, but whether he pleases his readers.

This long and well-written book is filled with good things – wit, perceptive insight, telling anecdotes, portraits of a galaxy of imposing literary personalities and the many-sided unsparing portrait of a singular personality against the vivid, turbulent background of the 20th century.

Leo Baeck holds readathon during book week

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Everyone agrees that it is important for children to read. Everyone also agrees that it is good for children to be interested in sports.

This year's Canadian Children's Book Week neatly combines both ideas, with its theme of Score Big With Books, to emphasize the many ways books enrich our lives and help us achieve our goals.

As part of its annual celebration of Canadian Children's Book Week, Leo Baeck Day School is incorporating that idea in a readathon, the proceeds of which have gone to purchasing sports equipment for Canada Centre in Metulla, Israel.

School principal Jan Lapedus explained that children undertake to read books between book week and December. They get sponsors for each book they read.

There are many other activities to mark the week, which runs from Nov. 6 until Nov. 10. Writers and illustrators, including Barbara Greenwood, Heather Collins and Frida Wishinsky appeared. Older students became storytellers to younger ones.

The Leo Baeck Day School students visiting the school's annual book fair during Canadian Children's Book Week. They are dressed as characters from their favourite story book.

A special feature was dress-up day, when students and staff dressed as characters from their favourite novel or story.

The Parents Association held a book fair at both the Atkinson and Holy Blossom campuses, where Indigo Book Store and Scholastic Books displayed their wares.

Dershowitz calls for objective inquiry into Mideast violence

By ANNA MORGAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Alan Dershowitz has a challenge for Israel and the world community.

The Palestinians have called for an international inquiry into who started the most recent cycle of violence in the Middle East. Israel should accept the challenge, Dershowitz recently told reporters before an address he gave at a UJA FEDERATION dinner.

A Harvard law professor who has represented Anatoly Sharansky, Claus von Bulow and Michael Milken, among others, Dershowitz is also the author of several works of fiction and non-fiction.

He calls for a commission made up of leading lawyers and judges from around the world who have taken no position on this issue.

"Not a kangaroo court hearing of the kind the United Nations would conduct.

"The UN," Dershowitz said, "is obviously disqualified as an independent source for making this investigation because it has already made its decision when it voted, with the assistance of Canada, to condemn Israel and not to condemn the Palestinians for their violence.

Alan Dershowitz

"Any court system that is established through the auspices of the United Nations will fail. There is a 100 percent guarantee that it will fail."

On the other hand, a fair commission, Dershowitz said, would find that after the Camp David accords, Yasser Arafat found himself sinking in world public opinion – particularly in Europe and Canada.

And in order to turn international opinion around, Arafat decided to play his traditional card – one he's used for the past 25 years, – the violence victimization card, Dershowitz said.

So the PLO waited for an excuse and Ariel Sharon provided the excuse – even though Sharon "had negotiated an agreement with Faisal Husseini, Arafat's man in Jerusalem," before visiting the Temple Mount.

"They simply waited until they could engage in a deliberate provocation, intending to get the Israeli guards to overreact.

"It's very easy to get a democracy to overreact," Dershowitz pointed out, "such as when Canada invoked the War Measures Act in '70 or '71 as the result of being provoked by terrorism in Montreal.

"Canada overreacted terribly. Of course, they were never condemned in the world community.

"Think about how England has reacted to terrorism by the Irish Republican Army, or France to the Algerian revolution," Dershowitz said.

As they have done in the past, the Palestinians provoked Israel into overreacting by taking teenagers and telling them when and at whom to throw rocks.

"A fair inquiry would not only put the blame squarely on the shoulders of the Palestinians, but would demonstrate a deliberate course of action by the Palestinians to provoke exactly the reaction by the media and the world community and the United Nations that they have done.

"And they have succeeded. And the fact that they have succeeded means that they will do it again and that every democracy is at risk for confrontation and violence, because terrorists have learned a lesson."

They have learned that "you can provoke a democracy into overreaction and then get the UN to condemn the overreaction rather than the provocation.

"And that's a very dangerous message for civilization to be sending."

You would think the media would be sophisticated enough to get into what's behind the provocations, he said.

Instead, the media have created a moral equivalency between Israel's reaction to terrorism and the intentional targeting of civilians by the Palestinians.

While the international community is motivated by their interests – they vote their oil interests, their pocketbooks or their diplomatic interests – the media are more surprising because there is a better story if you get to the truth, Dershowitz said.

"It may be a more difficult story to get, but a much more fascinating one."

Barak an unelectable commodity: Israeli journalist

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ehud Barak has become an "unelectable commodity," according to an Israeli journalist and former political reporter speaking here last week.

Haim Hecht, managing director of a Galilee area radio station, was in Toronto and London, Ont. on a UJA FEDERATION speaking tour when he told a small group of federation staff that Israel's prime minister had more mistakes and achievements to his credit in one year than any other prime minister would in five years.

Barak is an "outstanding man" with charisma, courage and sense, said Hecht. His greatest achievement, whether right or wrong, Hecht believes, was putting Jerusalem on the table. He may have moved too fast, however, because he wanted "to write his place in the history book too early."

"The Israeli public accepted [having Jerusalem on the table], and I think that after the riots, the percent will be even higher... Jerusalem today is actually divided."

He said he himself "could live with" a divided Jerusalem, but could not agree to Israel relinquishing the Jordan Valley, which connects Tiberias to Jerusalem. His views have to do with security, not religion, he said.

His radio station conducted a survey of 500 Arabs that indicated most Arabs in Israel want to remain Israeli citizens because of the quality of life and fair judicial system, said Hecht, who co-hosts a political television show and hosts a radio talk show in an area that is half-Jewish, half-Arab.

He acknowledged that the Arab living conditions are "poorer" than those of Jewish Israelis, and said 4 billion shekels have been allocated for development in Arab villages. Although the "popular feeling" is that the allocation is a reward for violence, to engender more negative feelings would only bring the next riot closer, Hecht said.

Today, he said, "the Arabs hate the guts of Ehud Barak, who was their great hope, because he has ordered the police to act fiercely in their demonstrations."

If a left-wing candidate in the next election doesn't have the Arab vote, he is a loser before the election has started, said Hecht.

A resident of Migdal, a town of 350 families on the Sea of Galilee, Hecht sees the Israeli medical system as the "final test" of discrimination and the epitome of coexistence. "If my child falls sick and an Arab child falls sick, they go to the same hospital and get the same treatment."

Most of the medical staff are Arab, he noted. "They are the best nurses...and suddenly I see many hundreds of thousands demonstrating against me in the streets...It looked like Kosovo."

During the riots, his two-hour talk show stretched to 24 hours. Thirteen Israeli Arabs were killed. Although Hecht vocally supported the Israeli police, he said that "every single shooting incident should be inquired by a judge" for Israel's sake, not CNN's.

He believes Israel's democracy is strong enough to deal with the situation, and that officers found not to have justification for shooting should be indicted.

"Many of my listeners said, 'Haim, is that you?'"

In recent months, the "old notions" about left and right have evaporated, said Hecht. At 49, he is rethinking how he defines himself.

It is quite clear, he said, that Israel's next government will be right-wing Likud and that they will sign a peace treaty. He believes elections will be held within the next year.

Wiesenthal Centre raises questions

By BRAM AARON
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — In light of last month's UN Security Council resolution condemning Israel for the recent wave of violence there, should Canada support the creation of an international criminal court by the UN?

This and other questions are being asked by the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre For Holocaust Studies (FSWC), which has launched a campaign to publicize Canada's role in the UN vote.

"The UN has passed a series of one-sided resolutions – one of which, unfortunately, Canada participated in – which did not have an even-handed approach that properly dealt with all the issues," said Leo Adler, national affairs director for FSWC, at a recent media conference.

"More disturbingly, while we are in the midst of the UN trying to set up [what is supposed to be a non-political] international court, [the Human Rights Commission] which is supposed to be concerned with human rights, blatantly labels Israel as guilty of war crimes. They're branding Israel as a criminal, and of course that's what the court is intending to do eventually.

"If that's the way it operates, then Canada should take a second look at their involvement in the human rights court," said Adler, a Toronto lawyer.

Supporting Adler and the centre in their views were criminal defence lawyers Edward Greenspan and John Rosen, and National Post columnist George Segal.

"This resolution is a condemnation without investigation, without trial, without inquiry into what's going on, inside a country which is fighting for its life," said Greenspan.

The lynching of two Jewish settlers "was inspired not by a hatred of Israel, but by a hatred of Jews," he said.

Rosen, also chair of the centre's legal committee, called on Canada to withdraw its support for the resolution and reconsider its support for a world court.

The Security Council, Rosen said, is a purely political body, just as an international criminal court would be.

"You can't have an international court free of political impositions. It's only and purely political. Prosecuting Israel is the obvious aim of many supporters of an international court. It really is a mockery of justice. I strongly condemn it."

Adler also criticized international media for not fairly portraying events in Israel and the Middle East.

"Israeli forces are executing tremendous restraint again Palestinians. No Israeli Defence Forces tank can fire, no heavy artillery can be fired without official permission, and never without being fired on first. And each time it does carry them out, the IDF must give sufficient advance warning to the Palestinians to evacuate the area.

"Most people don't know this because it is not being reported by mainstream media. Further, these items were not brought up by Canada in voting on the UN Security Council's resolution on the issue."

Commentary studies female point of view

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Rabbi Elyse Goldstein and seven fellow rabbinic graduates were preparing for job interviews in 1983, they were "told to be pseudo-men."

"The dean told us to wear a black suit, white shirt, black pantyhose and black shoes.

"We were supposed to hide any evidence of femininity," she told an audience at this year's Jewish Book Fair, at a program sponsored by Kolel, The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, of which Rabbi Goldstein is the rabbinic director.

"We did it," she said. "After all, we wanted a job."

At the time, she said, she became the first woman rabbi in Canada. There are now, she said, "either six times as many, or [still only] six women rabbis."

Eighteen years ago she was either the only woman, the token woman, or something exotic and unfamiliar, she said. "We were told to act, dress, preach and teach like men."

It doesn't irk her, anymore, she said, that her male colleagues are not called male rabbis or men rabbis, – "they are just rabbis."

Rather than continuing to "fight the marginalization of women clergy," she said, she decided "to find out what the female point of view [on religious commentary] would be like."

The result, Rabbi Goldstein said, is the recent book she edited, The Women's Torah Commentary; new insights from women rabbis on the 54 weekly Torah portions.

The book is not necessarily a forum for feminist viewpoints, she said. The intention was to get many points of view, just as traditional commentaries give many points of view from male scholars.

"It shows our unchanging reverence for an unchanging text," she said.

Rabbi Goldstein recognizes that "no one speaks for all women." For one thing, only the three streams of Judaism that ordain women are represented – Conservative, Reform, and Reconstructionist. Of these, not all the women have pulpits. Some are involved in youth work, counselling and teaching.

One character in the Bible that is discussed, for instance, is Serach bat Asher, the granddaughter of the patriarch Jacob. While many have never heard of her, she is the only woman who is mentioned both in the list of people who went down to Egypt in the time of Joseph, and in the list of those who left Egypt.

Another insight in the book is in the portion Pikudei, where the same root, pakad, used for the building of the tabernacle in the desert, is used elsewhere in accounts of barren women who were given children – Sarah, the wife of Abraham, and Channah, the mother of Samuel.

"In a sense, Pikudei describes the birthing of the mishkan by the Jewish people."

She said that she hopes that The Women's Torah Commentary will help celebrate the unique perspective that women can bring to Jewish scholarship, and encourage all women, including Orthodox women, to examine the texts "with more chutzpah."

When she celebrated her bat mitzvah in 1968, Rabbi Goldstein said, her declaration from the bimah that she planned to be a rabbi was met with gasps and disbelief. Now, she said, "there are some 400 women rabbis [worldwide.]"

They practise their rabbinate differently, she said. "We hold our babies during Adon Olam, and nurse them in our offices."

"Our [feminine side] doesn't have to be secondary."

Permanent peace agreement a mistake: Arens

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israeli leader Ehud Barak made a mistake trying to reach a permanent peace agreement with the Palestinians at last summer's unsuccessful Camp David summit, claims Moshe Arens, Israel's former defence and foreign minister.

"Barak should have tried for an interim accord," said Arens in an interview last week before delivering a speech on the peace process at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue under the auspices of B'nai Brith Canada and Herut Likud-Betar Tagar.

Arens gave Barak credit for having tried to end Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. "The goal was a worthy one," he noted.

But he also said that if Barak had lowered his sights, he and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat could well have signed a more modest agreement, and the current wave of unrest in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip might have been altogether avoided.

A member of the Knesset since 1974, Arens is one of the Likud party's senior statesmen. From 1982 to 1983, he was Israel's ambassador to the United States. He was appointed minister of defence in 1983, foreign minister in 1988, and minister of defence in 1990 and again in 1999, in the waning months of Benjamin Netanyahu's government.

Warming to the topic, Arens accused Barak of offering the Palestinians too many concessions at Camp David. "He went too far out on a limb," said Arens, who named Barak chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces in the early 1990s. "It was a very serious mistake on his part."

Moshe Arens

Barak should not have offered Arafat the Jordan Valley or Arab neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem, he said. And Barak conceded "too much" on the Palestinian refugee issue.

Sounding an optimistic note, he said he has not given up on the idea of peace. "Eventually, there will be an accord, but it's not around the corner."

Arens said that Arafat resorted to violence to wring a better deal out of Israel.

"He sees nothing wrong with using violence. It's part of his negotiating strategy. Arafat wants to achieve statehood through blood and fire. Israel must ensure that he doesn't make any gains from this violence."

In a reference to Barak's readiness to offer sweeping concessions at Camp David, Arens said it is paradoxical that Barak's flexibility led to the present mayhem.

Looking back at Israel's 1993 decision to recognize and enter into talks with the PLO, Arens described it as a fundamental mistake. Instead, Israel should have negotiated with "the elected Palestinian representatives in Judea and Samaria."

By recognizing the PLO, Israel tacitly encouraged the Palestinians to insist on their "right to return" to their former homes in what is now Israel, he argued.

Arens, known as a "pragmatic hawk," said that Barak has no other partner but Arafat at the moment. "Israel, like it or not, is stuck with him. Israel doesn't have an alternative but to talk with Arafat. The Oslo peace process put us into this dead end."

Asked whether Arafat has a hidden agenda, Arens said, "He and many Palestinians have such deep-rooted grievances against Israel and Jews that their aims are unlimited. The West Bank and Gaza are only their first step. My guess is that they may want all of Palestine."

Arens said that a Palestinian state exists "in everything but name" under the administration of the Palestinian Authority.

Jewish settlements beyond the Green Line, even if isolated by Palestinian villages and towns, should not be evacuated. Some Israeli settlers, however, may have to live under Palestinian sovereignty one day, he observed.

Casting aspersions on Barak's concept of unilateral separation, he urged Jews and Arabs to learn to live together. "It's a delusion you can put a wall between us."

Turning to domestic Israeli politics, Arens predicted that Likud will probably win the next election, regardless of who leads the party to victory. He declined to say whether he would support Ariel Sharon, Likud's acting leader, or Netanyahu, with whom he had a falling-out after sponsoring his political career in the 1980s.

"Barak has already lost the election. He's made so many mistakes. A lot of people are disenchanted and disappointed with him."

Arens chastised Barak for having ordered a unilateral withdrawal from Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon last May.

"Israel should have maintained it until Lebanon and Syria were prepared to keep the border quiet."

Now, he pointed out, Hezbollah is within "spitting distance" of Israel.

Talks with Syria, broken off last winter, will not resume unless Israel is ready to cede the whole of the Golan to Damascus, he said.

"I'm against it," said Arens, talking about the prospect of a full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan in exchange for a peace treaty with Syria.

In Israel's negotiations with Syria last December and January, the Syrians demanded not only the Golan but Israeli territory – Hamat Gader – as well, Arens charged. "(Hafez) Assad wanted 105 percent."

Asked to assess the regional military balance of power, Arens said that the pendulum has swung toward Israel in recent years.

"The situation is pretty good, but that doesn't mean we can deal with civil disturbances."

Israel, he added, should be concerned by Iran's and Iraq's efforts to develop long-range ballistic missiles. "But we're not sitting on our hands," he said, referring to Israel's newly developed battery of Arrow missiles.

As the future hurtles furiously towards us, how can the synagogue respond without abandoning the claims of the past? How can the synagogue provide community when the individual and the family demand a sense of place and purpose? An expert will reflect on the role of the synagogue — the place of learning and music, prayer and religious community — as we look towards the future.

Election 2000

Letter from PM Chrétien

The following is the complete text of the message Prime Minister Jean Chrétien sent last week to leaders in the Jewish community regarding Canada's support of UN Resolution 1322.

Recently I had a chance to meet with you, the leaders of the Canadian Jewish community, to discuss Canadian policy with respect to the recent outbreak of violence in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza. I felt that our time together was mutually beneficial, allowing me to clarify the Government of Canada's position and the leadership a chance to express deep and understandable concern about the impact of the renewed bloodshed on the security of Israel.

I know that the Government of Canada and the Canadian Jewish community share one overriding objective in the Middle East: securing a just, lasting and comprehensive peace.

In the past few weeks, the high hopes of achieving this elusive goal have faded. In our meeting, I heard frustration expressed that the unprecedented risks taken and courageous compromises offered by the Israeli government in pursuit of peace have not been reciprocated. Our government understands this frustration. We regret that Canada's vote on UN Security Council Resolution 1322 has added to this distress and frustration.

For most Canadians, the peace process in the Middle East is an abstract idea. Many do not fully grasp the risks entailed in following the path of peace, or the human price paid with each setback. It is a path that requires incredible courage, immense patience and endless perseverance.

But I also deeply believe that with all of its bitter frustrations, it is the only path open to the peoples of the Middle East that leads to the bright and secure future evoked by the late Yitzhak Rabin when he called for a final end to "blood and tears."

That is the path that Canada has and will continue to counsel all parties to follow.

Regarding our vote on UNSCR 1322, I came away from our meeting with a sense that the leadership of the Canadian Jewish community was reassured of the fact that one UN vote cannot define – or re-define – the deep and longstanding friendship that exists between Canada and Israel. Our commitment to Israel is longstanding and will remain a pillar of Canada's policy in the Middle East. In the time since UNSCR 1322, for instance, Canada has opposed what we felt to be a grossly unbalanced resolution (#S–5/1) at the Commission on Human Rights in Geneva. And we would not support a recent UN General Assembly Resolution (#A/ES–10/L.6) because it represented an unhelpful initiative in our collective efforts to move away from violence and back toward negotiations.

Our meeting also gave me a chance to share with the leadership the various initiatives that I have undertaken at the rmequest of Prime Minister Barak. His requests and my eagerness to respond positively reflects the kind of friendship – both on a personal and bilateral level – between Canada and Israel of which I am very proud.

In closing, let me reiterate, as I did at our meeting, that my door and the door of our government is always open. The Canadian Jewish community is welcome and encouraged to share its hopes and concerns. Our shared goal, as expressed at our meeting, is for Canada to serve as a facilitator of progress towards peace for Israel and her neighbours.

Sincerely,

The Rt. Hon. Jean Chrétien

it is open to every one, but that later "they were booted out."

Berlin said, however, that "we should not lose sight of the Alliance's history."

Referring to Canada's poor and disadvantaged, UJA FEDERATION president Allen Sandler asked the candidates what is being done for them.

Gray replied that the government has allocated $700 million for this purpose. Goldin said Alliance would exempt 1.4 million people from income tax so they would have money for housing and food.

Berlin reminded Gray that the funds allocated depend on the provinces agreeing to go 50-50 on the $700 million he mentioned.

McCrossan said single parent families are now the hardest hit by poverty and need help.

Debt, health care on agenda in Eglinton-Lawrence

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two issues that arise consistently in Eglinton-Lawrence riding are debt reduction and the health care system, which is "going to the dogs," said Joseph Volpe, MP for the riding since 1988.

A former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Health, Volpe, 53, argues for an accountability and performance measurement system. "The federal government can't just hand over money" for health care without such a system, he said.

In addition to short-term solutions, he advocates longer-term answers including recruitment and training of more doctors and nurses.

"A lot" of Eglinton-Lawrence constituents are very unhappy over Canada's support of the recent UN resolution criticizing Israel, said Volpe, who broke with the Liberals to criticize Canada's vote. About 17 percent of his constituents are Jewish, he said.

Joel Etienne

The riding has a relatively large proportion (about 15 percent of residents) over age 65, and over half the population has the equivalent of a college diploma or some university education. It is one of the wealthiest ridings, but one of the most diverse, he noted.

Volpe believes the lack of funding for the secular component of religious schools is "absolutely wrong," he said.

Simon Rowland

The riding is located between Yonge Street and the railway tracks west of Caledonia Road. Highway 401 is its northern boundary, and the southern boundary runs for the most part along Eglinton Avenue West, with a small portion between Dufferin Street and Winona Drive extending south to Rogers Road and a jog northward between Marlee Avenue and Bathurst Street.

Alliance candidate Joel Etienne, a native of Moncton, N.B. who moved here in 1998, said he has garnered some support in door-to-door canvassing, but voters have told him he might have a hard fight against Volpe.

The 26-year-old lawyer – who is black and Jewish, and davens at a number of shuls in the riding – insists his nomination had nothing to do with tokenism, but was the result of a fair vote. "I had to put up a fight," he said.

Etienne's father, a journalist and activist against the Duvalier dictatorship who was exiled from Haiti in the 1960s, embraced Judaism when many of his friends were becoming Muslims. His maternal grandfather, Rabbi David Feuerwerker, was a native of Sighet who lived much of his adult life in France before immigrating to Montreal in the late 1960s.

Etienne said the Alliance's approach is geared toward fairness. He and other former Jewish student activists are among those involved in the party. "Jews involved in this party are Jews who are aware, who have fought against anti-Semitism."

Etienne was one of four Jewish Alliance candidates to attend a recent rally for private school funding.

The Alliance will put more money into health care, and faster, than the Liberals will, said Etienne. The party is interested in lowering taxes and is committing $6 billion a year toward eliminating Canada's deficit, he noted.

NDP candidate Simon Rowland, a 19-year-old dot-com entrepreneur and social entrepreneurship student at the University of Toronto, is concerned about the implications of right-wing party policies. Aside from his concerns about the environment, health care and burdens on working families, he believes the government needs to fully fund the CBC immediately to avoid losing it to the private sector.

The NDP would cover home care and prescription drugs, and would double child tax benefits while eliminating taxes for low income earners, he said.

Regarding the UN vote, the NDP supports the rights of Palestinians to an independent state and the right of Israel to exist within safe and secure borders. He believes there is little gained by blaming one side or another, he said.

Rowland is in favour of prosecuting Nazi war criminals, he said, adding that he had put a lot more thought into economic and social issues.

Louise Sankey, the Conservative candidate, has been actively involved with the same political party since age 16. She finds the Alliance party "very dangerous," and criticized its policies relating to women, among others. She believes that Canada "drastically needs to have [PC leader] Joe Clark's integrity now."

Joe Volpe

She noted that Clark "has worked very hard for the State of Israel, and will continue to work." She didn't agree with the wording of the UN resolution, she said. "I think there should have been a better balanced resolution against violence, period."

The Conservatives would bring transfer payments for health care back to 1993/94 levels, she said.

Sankey, 43, is a small business owner who uses a wheelchair or scooter due to spina bifida. She keeps active by diving and downhill skiing using a modified "sit ski."

She is in favour of prosecuting war criminals but does not believe in government funding for any religious schools, including Catholic schools, which she attended. "Once we have all, we have a two-tier public school system, and we can't afford it. And then we don't have children going to school with children from other communities. We are a country where we can live in a harmonious way. I am afraid that some of that will be gone."

Louise Sankey

She does believe, however, that those who choose religious schools should receive a 100 percent tax writeoff.

Caplan fights to retain Thornhill

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — Elinor Caplan is taking nothing for granted.

Despite a comfortable win in the 1997 election and a seat at the cabinet table as minister of citizenship and immigration, this time Caplan is bracing for the fight of her political life.

Robert Goldin

Voters in the Thornhill riding, which is one-quarter Jewish and home to many communal leaders, are still fuming over Canada's support for UN Resolution 1322 – and Caplan's silence about it. At several recent public rallies, her name was even booed.

But Caplan, 56, hopes Jewish voters can take the long view.

"I'm hearing disappointment," she told The CJN, "but people are now starting to ask the right questions," such as whether Canada has changed its Mideast policy (no, she stresses). As well, she says, voters should appreciate the fact that Chrétien responded to the UN vote by meeting with Jewish leaders and giving them direct access to his office through his chief foreign policy advisor.

Elinor Caplan

"It's important for people to know they're being heard and listened to," Caplan says.

The Liberals have built solid relations with the Jewish community and Israel though "quiet effectiveness. People don't know that because you do it quietly. It's not effective if you're not quiet about it."

She points out that Chrétien was the first sitting prime minister to visit Israel and that he speaks to his Israeli counterpart "frequently. I mean, that didn't happen this week. I think there's an untold story there."

Caplan chooses her words carefully when explaining her silence on the UN vote. She's bound, she says, by cabinet confidentiality.

"I speak for the government, and there are constraints. I thought long and hard on what would be in the best interests of my riding, and I decided the best interests of Thornhill and my community would be for me to be at the [cabinet] table, expressing [constituents'] views at the table, ensuring that the cabinet and the prime minister knew and understood how they were feeling and why they were feeling that way. I felt that I could articulate that only if I was at table."

"The fact that [speaking out] is unheard of doesn't mean it can't be done. She's a representative of the Jewish community. If she cannot represent the Jewish community of Thornhill, she should stand in another riding. She must act in our best interest and she must act as a conduit to tell the government what the people of Thornhill feel. Her personal opinion, with all due respect, is irrelevant."

A 58-year-old native of South Africa, Goldin says that despite all the efforts by the Liberals to calm Jewish voters, nothing has changed.

Caplan "has gone on record as saying the government's stance toward Israel has not changed. The government's stance toward Israel is anti-Israel. In her own words, the position is the same."

While Day is "100 per cent in favour of Israel," the policy of the Alliance "is to be neutral, fair and equal [and] not to take sides against one party in a foreign dispute. We've got no right to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries."

And Jewish voters have nothing to fear from the Alliance, even if people like Doug Christie, lawyer to every Holocaust denier Canada has produced, comes out fulsomely in favour of Day, as he did this month.

The party has no control over who joins it, Goldin says, stressing that Christie was kicked out as soon as Alliance officials discovered he had joined.

The other major issue on Jewish voters' minds is school funding. Goldin is confident that Day's proposal of tax credits that would equal what Ontario spends per Catholic pupil could be done without infringing on provincial rights.

Meanwhile, the New Democratic standard bearer in Thornhill is Nathan Rotman, who ran in the riding for the NDP in the last provincial vote, picking up about 2.5 per cent of ballots cast.

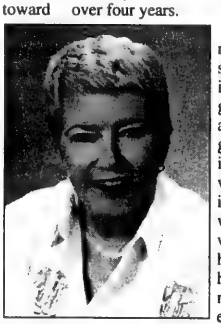
A 20-year-old assistant manager of a Toronto coffee shop, Rotman says he's hearing about Israel much less than he anticipated.

"I thought it would be huge. But the community's been pretty open-minded, and they've been talking about health care, education and social programs.

Nathan Rotman

"I'm happy people aren't focussing on a single issue. We really have to look at other issues," says Rotman, a former president of Shaar Shalom Synagogue's chapter of United Synagogue Youth and a volunteer for Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Recently, the NDP unveiled an ambitious platform that calls for increased spending on health care, housing, education and other areas. It's estimated the proposals would cost $100 billion over four years.



Lou Watson

Lou Watson, a retired educator, says there's truth in the name Progressive Conservative: "We are progressive on social issues and conservative on fiscal issues. I think it's what Canadians want," says the PC hopeful in Thornhill. "There's no need to go to the extreme left or the extreme right."

Watson, who lives in Barrie, believes Canadians trust Tory leader Joe Clark, who would offer "stable" leadership. Clark's plan to eliminate Canada's debt in 25 years is feasible, she says.

She's suspicious of the Alliance's pledge on tax credits for religious schools, saying it might infringe on provincial rights. "It's a promise that cannot be realized," says Watson, who attended last week's meeting of political figures at the Lipa Green building.

Health care, education and taxes are on voters' minds, but the candidate is also getting an earful about the UN vote on Israel. "People feel they have been betrayed," she says of Jewish voters, adding, though, that this is an issue affecting everyone: "When you take a position that is not sympathetic to various cultures, then it's a concern for all Canadians."

Election fever bypasses Calgary's Jewish community

By JUDY SHAPIRO
CJN Correspondent

CALGARY — It can't be said that election fever has gripped Calgary's Jewish community. There are few signs in evidence, and no clear issues of Jewish concern have emerged so far.

Calgary is Canadian Alliance country, and the riding in which the Jewish community is localized is no exception. All of Calgary's Jewish institutions – the four synagogues, two schools, and the Calgary Jewish Centre – are located in Calgary Southwest, currently held by former Reform party leader Preston Manning, who lost the challenge for the leadership of the Canadian Alliance to Stockwell Day.

Even though the bulk of the community resides in Manning's riding, it does not vote as a bloc. Jewish voters mirror the general voting pattern, says David Taras, a communications professor at the University of Calgary. The mood in the Jewish community, he says, is "not greatly different from the general mood in the city.

"People may be enraged about Israel [and Canada's vote to support the UN resolution that condemned Israel], but they vote on issues like taxes and employment," Taras said.

Riki Heilik, community relations director for the Calgary Jewish Community Council, believes the Reform party and Manning in particular "have been sensitive whenever the Jewish community has expressed concerns."

Heilik points to the reaction of the party early in its history to members who had links to racist groups.

"Reform was the only party to form policy indicating that people who espouse racist ideology cannot belong to the party," she pointed out.

Canada's UN vote on Israel is also on many minds here.

"We welcome the Alliance statement on the Security Council vote," Heilik stated. "Stockwell Day went on record denouncing Canada's support for the resolution. We welcome this kind of leadership because this is true to Canada's policy of neutrality, whereas the vote at the United Nations was inconsistent with our policy."

Other issues she believes to be of concern to the Jewish community are international terrorism, immigration, child poverty and the prosecution of suspected Nazi war criminals.

Public funding for private religious schools is not an issue in Alberta, where Jewish day schools already receive public dollars.

The other Calgary riding the community here is watching closely is Calgary Centre, where Progressive Conservative leader Joe Clark is running against incumbent Eric Lowther of the Alliance.

In one of the few local controversies, the Liberal candidate for Calgary Northeast, Hakim Faqiryar, withdrew from the race after he came under fire for hosting an Afghani-language cable TV show in Calgary in 1996.

Faqiryar allegedly called on Muslims to rise up against all non-believers, while sitting against a backdrop of banners that read, in one of the languages spoken in Afghanistan, "Death to Israel" and "Down with the United States."

MEETING FUTURE VOTERS:

Election 2000

Liberals reaching out to retain Jewish vote

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Not in recent memory has a sitting government so assiduously courted Jewish voters in this country as have Jean Chrétien's Liberals. In the span of three weeks, they have repeatedly reached out to Canada's Jewish community in a strenuous attempt to mollify its members and convince them to stand by their traditional support for the party, despite Ottawa's support for UN Resolution 1322 and promises from the Canadian Alliance of tax credits against tuition at religious schools.

Last week, Chrétien even went so far as to issue an unprecedented conciliatory message to Canada's Jewish leadership, in which he expressed "regret" that Ottawa's support for the UN measure condemning Israel "added to [the] distress and frustration" felt by the community. (For the full text of the prime minister's message, see page 22.)

Also last week, Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray was dispatched to an all-party meeting hosted by Canadian Jewish Congress in Toronto, where he attempted to explain and defend Canada's position on the Middle East. Gray ended up fending off tough questions and even the odd heckler while the Alliance representative was applauded.

Backgrounder

Last month, on the first morning of the campaign, all four of those Liberals were joined by the new Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley, in a hastily-arranged meeting at Caplan's riding office to hear grievances from a wide range of Jewish representatives.

Also last month, in a meeting with Jewish leaders, Chrétien established a direct contact between his office and the leadership in an attempt to avoid future flare-ups.

Many believe the prime minister has been sincere in his efforts to calm the community. Others say he is responding to an ominous feeling that some Toronto Liberals are in trouble. In Quebec, Montreal MP Irwin Cotler, who blasted his own government following the UN motion, is not expecting a tough fight to retain his Mount Royal seat.

But in and around Toronto, Jewish voters are still seething in several ridings, especially those represented by Caplan, Eggleton and Peterson. All three Alliance candidates in those ridings are Jewish, and say they are seeing levels of support that have surprised even them.

At last week's meeting before 11- to 13-year-old students at Associated Hebrew Schools, Caplan explained that the UN vote was taken in an attempt to end the violence in Israel. She said the United States leant "tacit support" for Israel's condemnation by abstaining from the vote.

Peterson, meantime, referred to Israel as "Canada's very special friend" and read Chrétien's letter. Principal Jerry Rosenfeld, perhaps echoing the sentiments of others, responded to the message this way: "We were looking for a clear statement of regret – not because of our anxiety, but because the vote was wrong."

However, the leaders of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith liked the prime minister's message.

CJC national president Moshe Ronen called it "a very positive initiative," while Frank Dimant, executive vice president of B'nai Brith, was quoted as saying the statement was "welcome."

Cotler, too, praised Chrétien's message as an "important matter of principle…on a human level." Barry Campbell, a Jewish former MP from Toronto, called the message "a very important statement," and said the community should be satisfied with the sentiments expressed in it and "mature enough to know that we are not going to be in a position to dictate to the government."

On the other hand, Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Montreal said Jews should be "neither satisfied nor content" with the message. "Whatever its intent, it will only be borne out by future actions. In Quebec, the only alternative is the Bloc Quebecois, so it's easy for the Liberals to take the Jewish vote for granted."

Prof. David Bercuson of the University of Calgary, a long-time observer of Canadian politics, said Chrétien's letter is little more than an election ploy.

"He's saying, 'I'm sorry you're upset.' That's just election talk. It certainly wasn't meant to convey a review of [Canadian] policy."

Neil Drabkin, a Jewish Alliance candidate in the suburban Montreal riding of Pierrefonds-Dollard, called Chrétien's message "insincere and too little, too late."

Chrétien should have been aware of the UN vote, Drabkin said. "If not, he has serious questions to answer about his leadership and his commitment to Israel."

CANADIAN ALLIANCE

A time for change

An Open Letter to the Jewish Community In Support of Israel From the Canadian Alliance Candidates of the Central GTA

Dear Friends:

We, the undersigned Canadian Alliance candidates for Parliament, entered this race for a number of reasons, many of which are outlined in our platform document. However, there is one timely issue that binds us not just as candidates, but also as Jews:

As you know, Canada's Liberal government recently supported UN resolution number 1322. This resolution condemned Israel as the sole party responsible for the recent violence in the Middle East.

The resolution was biased and unfair. It "deplore[d] the provocation carried out at Al-Haram Al-Sharif." By using the word "provocation," it rebukes Israel for allowing its opposition leader to walk legally on the Temple Mount, the holiest of Jewish sites. By using the name Al-Haram Al-Sharif to describe the Temple Mount, Canada signalled that Arabs own the ground that, under law, rightfully belongs to Israel. It cites "over 80 Palestinian deaths and many other casualties" but failed to mention a sole Israeli victim. It described Israel as an "occupying" power. Adding insult to irony, it called for an "objective" mechanism, presumably under UN auspices, to assign blame for the recent outbreak of violence.

At first, the Liberals dithered on the issue. The Liberals tried to pretend that Jean Chretien was not aware of the resolution — that lower level bureaucrats had approved it. Soon, however, they realized that approach would leave them open to charges of incompetence as well as malfeasance. So ultimately the Liberals confirmed that Canada's vote accurately reflected the government's position.

It was improper for Canada to have voted in favour. Canada's long-held position is that we support Israel's right to exist in peace and security, while recognizing the aspirations of the Palestinian people. Canadians believe that a lasting resolution can only be arrived at by way of peaceful negotiations.

It is important that we Jews be heard on this issue. Shortly after that resolution was passed last month, over 3,000 of us stood together at the Beth Avraham Yosef Toronto Synagogue to pray and to protest.

But the Liberal party under Jean Chretien's leadership is not listening or apologizing. His recent letter only stated, "regret that Canada's vote ... has added to this distress and frustration." Moreover, in the last year 19 UN resolutions were passed criticizing only Israel: Canada has voted "for" in 14 cases and abstained in 5.

Fortunately, there is an alternative. The Canadian Alliance and Stockwell Day have come out in strong and unequivocal support of Canada's historical position on the State of Israel. As the sole democracy in the Middle East, and as the only state of the Jewish People, Israel must continue to survive, and thrive. Canada must assist in that survival, not hinder it.

We, the undersigned candidates for the Canadian Alliance are proud to be Jews, we are proud to support the peace process, and we are proud to support Israel.

You can help. Please Volunteer — Donate — Vote.
Send the government a message: We must not be forgotten.

Yours truly,

Grafstein retains zest for life at 100

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At 100 years old, Helen Rose Grafstein, descendent of an ancient line of rabbis, is a thoroughly modern woman, says her son Senator Jerry Grafstein.

"She has deep private beliefs that are rooted in her family's history – her grandmother was a descendent of Shelah HaKadosh and her grandfather was a Chassid of the first Gerrer Rebbe of Poland. I believe this is one of the reasons for her long life," he said in an interview after his mother's birthday on Oct. 3.

Her life however, was "stalked with tragedy. Her father, who lived until he was 87, was blinded in an accident just before World War I; her dearest cousin died in the Dieppe raid; her mother died early due to the struggle and strain to provide for her family; my own father died prematurely in a car accident 50 year ago so my mother was left to raise me and my sister; my sister died suddenly some years ago, and my mother's younger sister also [died].

"My mother worked practically all of her life to provide for her family, and yet her unquenchable spirit and private beliefs survived and surmounted all these family burdens and tragedies," said Grafstein.

When we talk about women's rights, said Grafstein, [we talk about my mother]. "She saw her mother work to sustain their Kensington egg business. Though her father was considered head of the household, he was a scholar. The women took care of everything, and they never complained. Mother was very proud of her father."

Helen Rose also learned early about the spirit of volunteerism, said Grafstein. "Her mother put together a core of volunteers who helped make trousseaus for brides who could not afford them. My mother and aunt always helped her so my mother learned to give of her own time and effort."

His parents, who were born 30 miles from each other in Poland, married in Canada in 1930, and lived in London, Ont.

"My father lost his business during the Depression and then in 1950 after attending a Purim celebration, he was killed by a car. My mother was left to her own devices. She bought a millinery store which she ran until about 20 years ago when she moved to Toronto," said Grafstein.

Helen Rose Grafstein

All these events – and her pride in her family's heritage – strengthened her, he said.

She has a very happy side to her as well, said Grafstein. "She always sang in a choir, and to this day still attends practices. She also loves clothing, and when I went to Paris last year, she asked me to bring her a frock in the latest Paris colours.

"She is careful about her diet, and she always ate well and made sure she walked. She still goes to bingo, gets her hair done, attends exercise class, and until recently, made jewelry. She has an extraordinary zest for life," said Grafstein.

Wild Women take awareness on the road

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The three "wild women" are taking their passion on the road.

When Donna Keystone, Karen Loomer and Adrienne Rosen set out by car on Jan. 1 from Tierra del Fuego – 800 miles south of Santiago, Chile – back to Toronto, it will be to raise funds for the December 6 Fund, a volunteer organization that provides interest-free loans to women fleeing domestic abuse.

Dec. 6 is the anniversary of the Montreal massacre in which 14 women were murdered.

As a prelude to the 30-day fund-raising trip, a memorial service is planned at Holy Blossom Temple on Dec. 6, for the 14 women killed in 1989, and for all women murdered in domestic violence in Canada in the last year.

The idea of the trip was born says Keystone, 53, a family physician who pioneered the Jewish response to HIV-AIDS with programs at Holy Blossom, and a mother of five, when the trio decided that they wanted to show their daughters – they have eight between them – that they can still get out and have an adventure, and make a difference.

Violence is not attached to class, race or region, says Adrienne Rosen, 46, owner of International Courier and mother of two daughters. "This driving trip, through 11 countries, will exemplify how big the issue is.

"We have to do something to raise awareness. There are so many issues in people's faces every day, that [domestic violence] is not high on the priority list. Should women really have to leave their family for 30 days in order to get this issue out in the open?"

Every night, she says, every woman's shelter in Toronto is packed. "Is that the mark of a civilized society?"

Loomer [she is not Toronto Cantor Marshall Loomer's wife, who has the same name], mother of three daughters, says they will be speaking to women along the way and telling them that they can get out of a violent situation and start a new life. "They need to know that they do not have to take it anymore."

Women abuse is a hushed up issue, says Rosen. "It crosses every barrier. We are living in a culture where there is still some sanction for being beaten. Women are afraid to testify [against their mates] or go out on their own. There is little understanding of the handcuffs some women are living in.

"Until they can get some economic freedom, they are afraid to leave. The December 6 Fund helps women so finances are not an issue any more," says Rosen.

It takes tremendous support for women to get out [of a violent situation], and the support is just not there, especially for Jewish women, because it is often so hushed up," says Loomer.

All money that has been loaned to women from the fund has been paid back, says Rosen. "This enables them to pay for such things as a deposit on an apartment."

The "wild women" are currently shipping a Kia Sportage – Kia is one of the trip's sponsors – to Santiago, where they will meet it and drive south to the town of Ushuaia. From there they will begin the trek to Nathan Phillips Square.

Apart from staying in Hilton hotels in large cities, because Hilton is another sponsor, the women will camp throughout the trip. "We're not living the plush life. We'll be close to the bone," says Loomer.

They have learned how to repair the vehicle, learned Spanish, and have pored over road maps. "We are traditional, egalitarian women, so we will not be driving on Shabbat. We plan to make Shabbat dinners, and we will daven daily. We are going to cram our freezer with kosher salamis," says Rosen.

The trip will be updated daily on their Web site – www.wildwomen.ca – so people can follow them online. A link to the December 6 Fund will allow people to donate money to the fund, and corporate donations will also be taken at that site.

Karen Loomer, Adrienne Rosen and Donna Keystone.

This is a final stunt to stop men from beating up women in their home, a place that is supposed to be sacred, says Loomer. "When women are not safe in their own home, what does that say about the spirit of safety?

"We want all our daughters to remember this trip and know that there is an option," she says.

Other sponsors for the trip include International Courier, Indigo Books, ESI Robotics, Bridgepoint, Henry's Camera, Canadian Auto Workers women's division, Benjamin's Park Memorial, Castrol Oil, Goodyear Tires and Winter McLachlan.

Holocaust Education Week

Waxman explores creation of Anne Frank play

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Al Waxman said he wanted the play to show that what happened to the characters was a result of their being Jewish – and for no other reason.

Waxman, who produced and directed Diary of Anne Frank at Stratford Festival, said was determined that the play would not dilute its Jewishness, as did the "birthday card greeting" versions produced by Hollywood and Broadway.

Speaking at Shaar Shalom Synagogue at a Holocaust Education Week event, Waxman said he was "unimpressed" by a Broadway revival he saw this year, but was surprised at how it affected young people who saw it. "That's when I decided that the story must be told again and again."

Stating that he was a victim of anti-Semitism in his youth, Waxman declared: "We have come a long way, but that doesn't mean we don't still have a long way to go."

The evening included the dedication by Harry Wolle of a three-year brotherhood project – a book and a pedestal made of Jerusalem stone, both commemorating the victims of the Shoah.

Earlier, eight young March of the Living participants marched in with Israeli and Canadian flags. Six survivors and children of survivors lit memorial candles: Chaim, Amnon and Renee Kestelman, Frieda Ribkowski, Shirley Ribkowski-Rachman and Jodi Rachman Patel.

An appeal by March of Living participant Jennifer Rudnick was echoed by Waxman, who said it was important to take Diary's message "to the young people who are not here tonight."

His said he once experienced a sense of the claustrophobia similar to that affecting the eight people in the play who hid in a small apartment, when he was stuck for 20 minutes in the elevator at a hotel in Montreal.

"I decided that the eight would never leave the stage, even at intermission. As a theatregoer commented to me later, 'Where would they go anyway?'"

He researched for a year before doing the play ("I'm a slow reader"), he said. He got entry, with actor Maggie Blake, to the attic in Amsterdam of the apartment where the Frank family hid, which is off limits to the public.

"I wanted to feel what she felt," he said. He spent every waking hour of seven days at the Frank house.

Nothing makes him more angry, he said, than people who say it would be better for Jews if the actual diary, turned over to writer Myer Levin in Paris, had never been found.

The "powers that be" on Broadway decided that Levin's play was "too Jewish," he said, "and Otto Frank came down on their side."

For his production, he added to the script, for he first time, lines he found in the diary, in which Anne said wars and atrocities would not be possible if the "little people" did not back up the actions of big government and corporations.

"Anne wrote that there is something in all of us that wants to kill, to destroy what took years to build," he said.

He included Anne's entry to the diary that "people are good at heart," and her vow to her mother that "I cannot build foundations of hope on the suffering here."

Waxman had high praise for his cast of eight, which included only one Jew, for the way they learned their Yiddish lines.

Waxman paid tribute to Anita Mayer, of Toronto, a friend of the Frank family and author of One Who Came Back, who was in the audience, for agreeing to meet the three woman who were playing Anne, her sister Margot, and their mother.

"They asked her if she still believed in God. She said, yes, she did." "How can you believe after what you have been through?" they asked. And she replied, 'God is not a babysitter.'"

The fate of Reinhard Beyeth discovered

BY BETH PORTER
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Faye (née Beyth) and Eric Goldfarb recently visited the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington D.C. with other children who survived the Holocaust in France. They were paying tribute to OSE (Oeuvre de Secours aux Enfants), the Jewish Children's Aid Society that cared for them during the war.

The Goldfarbs, who now live in Thornhill, were young teenagers when they were sent to France from their home in Berlin in the fearful months following Kristallnacht.

They didn't know each other then, but in 1943 they met while trying to find shelter on a wintery strip of no-man's land near the Swiss border, from which they had been turned back.

Both joined the Resistance, and after the war, they married.

I learned about OSE when I approached Faye and Eric to speak at our Holocaust Education Week event at L'Arche Daybreak this year.

But there is another aspect of the Goldfarbs' story that astounded us at Daybreak.

Faye had an older brother, Reinhard, who had suffered some brain damage. In Nazi Germany, Reinhard had two strokes against him: he was Jewish and he had a disability.

In 1939, Faye's father entrusted Reinhard to the v. Bodelschwinghsche Anstalten Bethel, an old and respected Protestant-run institution, where as one of only a few Jewish children, he might possibly pass the scrutiny of the authorities.

In time, her father was told that the Jewish residents had been moved to a hospital in Poland, and he was given a post box address there to send support payments, which he did until 1942.

Faye's assumption that Reinhard had been one of the millions who died in Poland seemed confirmed when two years ago, she came across her brother's name in a German publication, where he was listed as deported to Poland with no further trace. So the story stood until three weeks ago.

When I invited the Goldfarbs, I had explained that L'Arche Daybreak is a community for people with developmental disabilities, and I could tell their interest was piqued. In fact, the invitation awakened in Faye a determination to learn more about her brother's fate.

Eric's Internet skills enabled them to contact a helpful historian-archivist at the Bethel Institution, still extant in Germany. The story that emerged has unusual twists that both outrage and perhaps, in a small way, console:

The Jewish children at Bethel, who were supposedly moved to Poland, Reinhard among them, were, in fact, taken immediately to a facility quite near Berlin, and gassed. The hospital in Poland never even existed!

In 1993, the Bethel organization wanted to memorialize their murdered Jewish residents, and in 1993 it named a new home after Faye's brother.

The speaker at the opening of Reinhard Beyth House had actually known and cared for Reinhard. Now, Faye and Eric are planning to travel to Germany to visit the Bethel institution at Bielefeld and hope to meet this person.

When the Goldfarbs spoke to us at Daybreak, we were struck that they might well have been bitter and angry, but they spoke so graciously and positively.

OSE, they indicated, had helped them have a less devastating experience than many others. And we were especially touched by Faye's account of Reinhard.

It seemed appropriate, when at the end of the program, Michael Arnett, a Daybreak member who has a disability, helped thank them for coming.

Beth Porter is an assistant at L'Arche Daybreak, one of the federation of L'Arche Communities for people with developmental disabilities founded by Jean Vanier, and a member of the Holocaust remembrance committee of Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto.

Role of women increased after Kristallnacht

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Jewish women heroically shouldered immense burdens after Kristallnacht in 1938, an American historian told a forum last week.

Marion Kaplan, a Queens College scholar and the author of a book about Jewish life in Germany under National Socialism, said that important tasks fell to women after 30,000 Jewish men were rounded up in the wake of that nation-wide pogrom in Germany, a prelude to the Holocaust.

She spoke at the closing event of the 20th annual Holocaust Education Week. It was held at Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto Congregation nearly two weeks after the firebombing of two synagogues in Edmonton, Alberta.

Taking the podium following a candle-lighting ceremony marking Kristallnacht 62 years ago this month, Kaplan explained that Jewish women performed a variety of jobs as the dust of the pogrom settled.

They worked tirelessly to gain the release of husbands who had been packed off to concentration camps in Germany.

They sold property and tried to obtain foreign visas in preparation for leaving the country.

Lacing her narrative with poignant excerpts from memoirs, poems and letters written by Jewish women during this chaotic period, Kaplan paid tribute to them by saying that they acted calmly and courageously as Nazi savagery and barbarism traumatized Germany's Jewish community.

Kaplan also said that Jewish women defended the honour of the community and were in the forefront of urging Jews to emigrate.

Men found it harder to leave than women, she said. Men were family breadwinners and women believed they would be spared serious physical harm. Women also felt a responsibility to care for elderly parents who preferred to remain behind.

By 1939, 58 percent of the Jews left in Germany were females.

Observing that Kristallnacht tipped the balance toward emigration, Kaplan said that 270,000 Jews managed to flee before the German government closed the gates in the autumn of 1941.

Of these, some 30,000 Jews who had found refuge in neighbouring countries were eventually caught and murdered.

Kaplan said that Jews eager to leave were stymied by a web of bureaucracy, a host of restrictive laws and the unwillingness of foreign governments to issue visas.

Taking advantage of their plight, Germans enriched themselves from the wholesale theft of Jewish property and from the purchase of Jewish homes and properties for a pittance, she added.

Those who could leave were forced to pack "a lifetime of possessions" into several suitcases and to bid tearful and agonizing farewells as they set off for an uncertain future.

Creativity of Jewish artists celebrated

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Actors, singers, dancers, journalists, filmmakers and Yiddish speakers were on stage recently for a concert that celebrated the creativity of Jewish artists.

Zog Nit Keyn Mol, (Never Say) written by martyr Hirsh Glik, the rousing song of the Jewish underground, sung in Yiddish by the combined choirs of the Bloor JCC and Trinity St. Paul, was the emotional conclusion to the Holocaust Education week event, held at at Trinity St. Paul's Church.

"Our non-Jewish choir members had difficulty learning to sing Zog Nit Keyn Mol in Yiddish," said Harriet Wichin, leader of the Bloor JCC choir of 52, one-third of whom are not Jewish. It combined with the Trinity St. Paul's choir of 30 members conducted by Brad Retzlof.

Although she is Jewish, Wichin (Winchevsky), a documentary filmmaker, said she is a non-native Yiddish speaker.

"The Yiddish language could not be extinguished and was part of that creativity," said Eda Zimler, president of Friends of Yiddish, a co-sponsor of the event.

The audience took part in singing Never Say, along with the choirs, singer David Wall, accordionist Sasha Luminsky, and chair Marc Glassman,

A highlight of the evening included actor Alon Nashman and teacher Ellie Moidel, who read – in English and Yiddish alternately – from the trilogy Tree of Life, by writer Chava Rosenfarb of Montreal, a survivor of Lodz ghetto.

The chapter they read, a true story, dealt with a father trying in vain to hide his new-born baby and his little sister from the Nazis. His wife and children have been taken, and all he finds in their place is a doll.

Maggie Blake, 17, whose run in The Diary of Anne Frank at Stratford has just concluded, read her favourite excerpts from the diary, including the part where Anne professes her love for Peter. Rick Salutin, Harry Paikin and Tammy Landau, the latter from the BJCC, a co-sponsor, also took part. Other sponsors were the UJA FEDERATION Committee for Yiddish.

The documentary films of Toronto native Elida Schogt, Zyklon Portrait and The Walnut Tree, were screened.

You don't have to make headlines to cause a Chillul Hashem

Come to a community-wide event featuring

Tuesday Nov. 28th, 8pm
Beth Jacob V'Anshe Drildz

Sponsored by all participating synagogues and yeshivot

When a Jewish public figure gets caught in a scandal, all Jews cringe. Especially when "Orthodox" appears in the article.

But you don't have to be famous to cause a Chillul Hashem. You don't have to be Orthodox. And you don't even have to transgress a mitzvah.

All it takes is for any Jew to slip in awareness that he or she represents God and the Jewish people.

People judge Jews. Jews judge Orthodox Jews. And through us they judge God and His Torah. Halacha therefore wants you to be concerned with how people perceive your behavior. No matter who you are. No matter how inconsequential it seems to you.

And it's not just public behavior. There's one-on-one Chillul Hashem too. When you unjustly favor a Jew over a non-Jew. When you lie, cheat on a partner or brazenly ignore an older person who needs your help to get across the street. In public and in private you must be aware of your Judaism. And aware of Whom and What you represent.

And let's be honest. Whether you're wearing a kippah or a hat, or even if you're bareheaded, you could still cause a Chillul Hashem. People at your workplace know you're Jewish. You might have a recognizably Jewish name. You might simply look Jewish. Regardless, if there's even the slightest doubt you might cause a Chillul Hashem, be careful. Halacha takes Chillul Hashem very seriously.

Beginning in November, through The S. Daniel Abraham and Ira L. Rennert Torah Ethics Project of The Orthodox Caucus, thousands of families in the greater Toronto area are focusing on Chillul and Kiddush Hashem. In their synagogues, yeshivot and at their Shabbat tables, they are studying, discussing and reflecting on the many halachot and teachings about the desecration and sanctification of God's name.

After all, you can do anything you want to do to your name.

But not to God's.

Nathan Lewin, a member of The Orthodox Caucus, received his BA from Yeshiva University and graduated from Harvard Law School. Mr. Lewin has defended the constitutionality of numerous important issues for the Jewish community before the US Supreme Court and serves as legal counsel for Agudath Israel.

St. Louis survivors get apology

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Canada has never apologized for refusing entry to the SS St. Louis and sending the ship's Jewish passengers back to Europe, where most of them died in the Holocaust.

But earlier this month, Christians from various churches apologized to 25 survivors of the ill-fated ship at an historic ceremony held in the capital.

Organized by the grassroots Christian group, Watchmen for the Nations, under the leadership of Egyptian-born David Demien, the event brought together aging survivors of the St. Louis from around the world.

"Our government turned hundreds of Jews over to the death camps by rejecting the St. Louis," said Canadian Christian broadcaster Rev. David Mainse, "just as surely as if Canada had collaborated with the Nazis.

"For those of your brothers and sisters who perished, and for the 1,000 children who expected to come to Canada but never made it, I ask that you hear us out and respond in any way in which you choose to respond," Mainse said.

The St. Louis set sail from Hamburg in May 1939. It carried more than 900 Jewish refugees of Nazi Germany. The destination was Cuba, which inexplicably denied the ship entry.

Desperate appeals to western nations, including the United States and Canada, were spurned.

Denied a haven, the vessel was forced to return to Germany. Only at the last minute did four nations, Britain, France, the Netherlands and Belgium, agree to accept the passengers.

But when the Nazis overran the latter three countries, Jews became their first victims.

It's estimated that half the ship's passengers were murdered in the Holocaust. Over the years, the fate of the St. Louis became synonymous with the world's indifference to the plight of wartime European Jews.

At the recent ceremony, Marcel Gervais, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Ottawa and a representative of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, told survivors: "Your presence here today provides us with a much needed opportunity to promote healing… as Christians and Canadians, we are trying our best to come to terms with our confessional history, so as to promote repentance, healing and reconciliation."

Barry Boucher, a Protestant minister, stated: "Tonight you are being welcomed to Ottawa, Canada's capital – a very different response from 1939 when you were not even welcomed to its shores," he said.

Kenny Blacksmith, representing First Nations people, expressed empathy with Jews: "I believe we understand the pain of the Jewish people."

Referring to Canada's support for the United Nations resolution that condemned Israel, Blacksmith noted that when Israel needed help at a crucial time, Canadians once again did not come through. He later shook hands with every St. Louis survivor.

"Never again will this world endure such a holocaust, with such accompanying tragedies as the SS St. Louis. Now, after more than 60 years, we open our hearts to the survivors. Please forgive us and accept our humble heartbreak," he said.

Rev. Doug Blair, a Baptist pastor from Sarnia, spoke of his deep regret on behalf of his great-uncle, Frederick Blair, who enforced Canadian immigration policy at the time the St. Louis sought refuge here.

A vocal anti-Semite and subject of the book None is Too Many, Blair said Canada had already done too much for the Jews, and refused to help.

"I understand that my name is not dear to your heart," said Rev. Blair. "To the extent that my family was part of that, I'm sorry."

The only representative of the Jewish community, Rabbi Arnold Fine, spoke of his deep respect and admiration for the survivors, for their ability to rise above the hatred and suffering, for their ability to love. No mention was made of the apology or of its acceptance.

Canadian Jewish Congress had been invited to attend but declined. "We don't doubt the sincerity of the group," said the CJC's Ron Singer, "but as the major Jewish representative organization in Canada, we did not want to give the impression that we were there to officially accept an apology."

Rabbis, imam sign resolution against Middle East violence

OTTAWA — Ottawa's six pulpit rabbis and the imam of a large mosque have issued the following joint statement on recent hostilities in the Middle East:

"We view with great concern the outbreak of violence in the Middle East. We hope and pray that this region, and indeed the entire world, will enjoy peace and prosperity.

"We likewise are greatly alarmed at the transporting of these hostilities to many parts of the world, and the irresponsible attacks on innocent civilians.

"Particularly are we upset at the violence that has reared its head in Canada. We call on the members of our respective faith communities to continue working together as we have in the past. Canada is a peace-loving country. We have been fortunate to work together on many issues to our mutual benefit and to the benefit of Canada as a whole.

"We hope and pray that this spirit of co-operation will be our prevailing motif and that we will continue to strengthen our friendships and our commitments."

The statement was signed by Sheikh Gamal Solaiman, imam of the Ottawa Mosque, and by the following rabbis: Reuven Bulka, Mordecai Berger, Ely Braun, Arnold Fine, Howard Finkelstein and Steven Garton. It was distributed to media outlets across Canada. D.K.

שישאר בינינו

חפרדה מלאה

Rabbi Plaut celebrates 88th birthday in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A birthday cake and a group of admirers formed part of the 88th birthday celebrations for Rabbi Gunther Plaut, held recently at the National Library of Canada.

Rabbi Plaut, senior scholar and rabbi emeritus at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto, was in Ottawa to give a lecture on his life and career, titled Lights and Shadows of a Long Life.

Senator Jerry Grafstein, one of the evening's sponsors along with the National Library and the Jacob M. Lowy Collection of Hebraica and Judaica, introduced Rabbi Plaut as "our renaissance rabbi."

Rabbi Plaut spoke of the Lowy collection, remarking that there are many parallels between books and humans. However, for humans, "being old does not make us more valuable," he said.

He recalled a childhood filled with a love of learning passed on by his parents, his study of the law in his native Germany and his subsequent – almost accidental – career change when he arrived in the United States in 1935 and found he had to begin his studies all over again.

His studies at Hebrew Union College were intended to fill time while the situation in Germany settled down so that he could return and practise law. When it became clear that was not to be, he decided to become ordained as a rabbi.

"I didn't chase after Torah," he said. "Torah grabbed me. I found the rabbinate, over the years, something that was enormously fulfilling."

Rabbi Plaut introduced his new book, The Price and Privilege of Growing Old, the latest of some 25 volumes he has published.

His latest cause is fighting ageism. "The more primitive the society, the better they treat the aged. The more advanced the society, the worse they treat them," he said.

"My book deals with what I consider a catastrophe in North American life – the derogation of the old."

Although there are disadvantages to getting old, "there are also a series of privileges." For example, he now has more patience than ever, and is no longer competitive, he said.

"I have learned to love poetry more than ever before because it touches the soul in ways in which I never let it before because I was too busy."

Rabbi Plaut spoke poignantly of his wife of 62 years, who has been hospitalized for the past nine months following a stroke, and whom he visits daily.

"There is no life without its shadows," he said, "but I have seen more light than anything else and I hope to keep my eyes open and see some more."

Lessons about community's leadership

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Every time the furor surrounding the Jewish reaction to Canada's vote at the Security Council subsides, another development thrusts it back onto the pages of the national press. Most recently, Canadian Arab groups reacted strongly, and none too happily, following reports of a conciliatory (some would even say apologetic) letter sent by the prime minister to Jewish leaders.

Some of the very leaders who were most critical of the government's support for the anti-Israel resolution expressed satisfaction that the PM had "heard our anger." However, the communiqué – released on the PMO Web site along with a press statement – indicates that the meeting with the community leadership in which Jean Chrétien was so responsive to Jewish concerns took place before the election call.

If that meeting did satisfy Jewish concerns, why was there such a cacophony of threats about voting patterns and political support shifting away from the Liberals? Simply put, the chronology of events cannot be reconciled with the anger that has greeted Liberal candidates since the beginning of the campaign.

As a result, some within Liberal headquarters are musing about the "M" word, as in manipulation.

There are really only two possible explanations – and neither is especially reassuring. First, even though Jewish leaders were satisfied with their discussion with the prime minister last month, their constituency wasn't buying in. So, rather than acknowledge that the leadership of the community was powerless, they "rode the wave" of communal frustration. Second, Jewish leadership sought to exploit the opportunities suddenly available due to the election and, as some people believe, didn't just ride the wave of emotion, but created and drove it.

Either way, the Jews of Canada gained nothing as a result of this little drama. If anything, the evidence suggests a net loss, including some alienated Liberal supporters of Israel and Jewish causes, a stirred-up Arab constituency that will redouble its efforts to ensure no pro-Israel tilt by the government and a political sector that will be a lot warier (suspicious, perhaps) of contact with the Jewish community.

The one good thing that may come out of all this is a growing awareness among Jews that their leadership is not so much manipulative as incompetent.

Arab-Jewish Dialogue now virtual

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It is one thing to believe in the Middle East peace process. But it is another thing to host a group of Arabs and Jews in your living room.

"Dad, I have to get off the phone, forty people are coming over in five minutes!" I said from my apartment in Montreal, where I was a student at McGill University last year.

"You're having a party on a Tuesday night?" my father exclaimed from Toronto.

"No, a group of Arabs and Jews are coming over to talk," I replied.

"What?" he asked in disbelief.

"It's Arab-Jewish Dialogue, Dad, and it's starting in my living room now. I gotta run."

Arab-Jewish Dialogue, which ran for six years but is now confined to a listserv, was a group of Montreal students and young adults who met weekly to discuss the Middle East. It began in the wake of the Hebron Massacre of 1994, and the student demonstrations which ensued in Montreal.

Within a few weeks Dialogue grew to about a dozen students who attended weekly, informal meetings. Unaffiliated with any university or institution such as Hillel or the Palestinian Solidarity Committee, Arab-Jewish Dialogue had no political objectives or ideology to promote.

The original goal, as Bock delineates, was simply to create "channels of communication between different groups that remained otherwise incommunicado... The essential principle of the group was a mutual recognition... The goal of the group was not a single reading of history nor an attempt to set the record straight once and for all. The commitment to return the following week was perhaps the most important objective."

A typical meeting involved anywhere from five to 50 people sitting in a loose circle in a student's apartment. Sometimes there was a moderator. Often there was an agenda or at least a specific topic of discussion, usually related to current events in the Middle East. Rarely was there consensus.

Dialogue was a time for debate, questions, and sometimes dispute.

For many, however, Dialogue was simply a place to meet Arabs and Jews.

I met Arabs who told me that before Dialogue they had never actually talked to Jewish people.

Breaking down stereotypes

Bock remembers a Dialogue meeting where a Palestinian woman raised in Toronto admitted that until she was about 13 years old, she believed Israelis looked like "tanks with hands and heads and scowls on their faces."

Similarly, before attending Dialogue, the only image of Palestinians that many Jews had was of stone-throwing youth.

In this sense, Dialogue was successful in breaking down stereotypes and creating a relationship between Arabs and Jews, albeit geographically far from the Middle East.

After an hour or two of intense discussion and debate, groups of students from Dialogue used to walk home together. Strolling down snowy St. Laurent Street, comparing amounts of schoolwork, offering advice on where to find the best groceries, they look no different than other groups of students walking home.

But this year, no one has initiated a meeting. Most believe Dialogue has stopped because of the current crisis in the Middle East.

Dialogue participant and McGill student Ariella Bock, Yonaton Bock's younger sister, believes it has failed "because now when there is the real need to sit down and discuss everything that is going on, we can't."

Instead, Arab-Jewish Dialogue has been confined to a McGill listserv created last year. Consisting of approximately 40 people, the Arab-Jewish Dialogue listserv is a virtual forum. Members post their opinions and questions, as well as petitions and articles from sources such as the Jerusalem Post, Reuters, the Economist, Ha'aretz, and Al Ahram Weekly.

Some articles are ignored, while others are followed by a succession of responses, often leading to heated online debates.

The listserv, Yonaton Bock argues, "allows for wider participation...[for] people to read and respond...when it is most convenient."

Recently, however, many people have unsubscribed from the listserv because there have been many e-mails brimming with hatred, according to Dahlia Genusov, its co-ordinator.

"The listserv could be construed as a forum where people can have the soapbox to speak without the accountability to listen," states Bock.

As a former Dialogue participant, I feel, as do many other participants, that the listserv is nevertheless important, and certainly better than no communication at all.

But Arab-Jewish Dialogue must begin again.

Zeina Awad, an active participant from the beginning, argues that Dialogue "is the only model for peace... [and] there is no peace without the people talking to each other."

Yet with every stone thrown, and every bullet shot, Arab-Jewish Dialogue becomes only a distant memory of shared living rooms.

Lara Rabinovitch is a third-year Jewish studies major spending this year as a visiting student at York University.

Leah Rabin, 72, cancer victim

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Leah Rabin, a heavy smoker, lost consciousness Sunday morning, after a continuous deterioration in her condition over the last few days.

Her deteriorating health had prevented her joining German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder in wreath-laying ceremonies at her husband's grave in Jerusalem on October 31. Mrs. Rabin was also unable to take part in the Tel Aviv rally on November 4 that marked the fifth anniversary of her husband's death.

She was to be buried Wednesday in a plot next to her late husband's in Jerusalem's Mount Herzl cemetery. Her coffin will pass through Rabin Square in Tel Aviv, where Rabin was assassinated on November 4, 1995.

Minister Matan Vilnai, who chairs the ceremonial committee, expects many leaders from around the world to attend the funeral.

Leah Rabin was born in 1928 to well-to-do parents in what was then Germany and moved to British-ruled Palestine when Hitler rose to power.

As a high school student in Tel Aviv, she met Yitzhak Rabin, an officer in the Palmach, the elite force of the pre-state militia. She entered a teachers' training college but then left her studies to join the Palmach.

She and Rabin married during Israel's Independence War in 1948, in which he commanded the forces that lifted the siege on Jerusalem.

By 1967, Rabin became the Israel Defence Forces' chief of staff, leading Israel's crushing victory in the Six Day War. He was then appointed ambassador to the United States, and in 1974 was elected prime minister. Three years later he was forced to resign when a journalist revealed that his wife had retained a dollar account in the United States, in violation of Israeli law at the time. The prime minister stood by his wife and temporarily withdrew from public life.

In 1994, during his second term as prime minister, Mrs. Rabin was criticized again when a battalion of soldiers received orders to search the sand for a brooch that she had lost during the desert signing ceremony of the Israeli-Jordanian peace treaty.

Eyebrows were raised again after Rabin's assassination when she demanded – and received – an office and all the services that are normally provided to former prime ministers, but not to their widows.

A fiery keeper of the flame

By DORON ROSENBLUM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

People like Leah Rabin are hard to come by in this day and age. A strong, dominant woman who unabashedly and fervently devoted her all to her man's success, to his promotion and then to immortalizing his memory for all eternity.

We in Israel are much more accustomed to the low-key wife who stays backstage and only makes the mandatory public appearances, or, alternatively, to women politicians and businesswomen with their own independent careers.

Leah Rabin was passionate and opinionated: When she hated something or someone, it was all the way. She was ambitious to the point that it wasn't always clear where Yitzhak's career ended and Leah's began.

Anthony Trollope's novels are perhaps the only place one can find figures of this magnitude: the bishops' and archbishops' wives, whose lives are inextricably intertwined with their husbands' careers; full-time wives, always personal, always emotional.

It was fascinating to see the contrast between the reserved-cum-clumsy Yitzhak Rabin and the blunt extroverted woman behind him, who was sometimes the unwitting cause of his downfall. But the duo became a single entity in the public arena as well: It is hard to imagine the shy, modest Sabra's coronation without that one-woman-court.

She assumed the role of the widow of the martyr of peace with the same high-profile assertiveness with which she played Mrs. Ambassador, Mme. Minister, and the first lady.

Rabin's commemoration turned into a huge project, branching out across the globe, and sometimes reaching levels of glitz and showiness that were in complete contrast with the straightforward Yitzhak Rabin that we knew.

But in her own way, Leah was just as straightforward. Her emotional devotion and dominance rendered her "controversial;" she certainly managed to step on so many people's toes.

Yet how glorious – and important – was the elementary, simple and direct fury that she managed to distill and save for her husband's enemies, whom she equated (and in most cases rightfully so) with the enemies of peace, normalcy, and Israeliness itself. How much courage and power she mustered in this feminine and emotional mobilization: unforgetting, uncompromising, unforgiving, while all around her there was only white-washing, sycophancy and might-makes-right.

All in all, a romantic figure, larger than life. Restless, inconsolable, unforgiving to the very end, Leah Rabin too joined that very "eternity" that she worked so hard to maintain. That same elusive Israeli "eternity," whose longevity is only defined by that of its most zealous keepers.

General Assembly focuses on Israel

Speaking at the opening event, Rabbi Melchior noted that one of the reasons he entered public life was to remind himself and others that "the commitment to Torah is the commitment to peace."

Israel's first lady, Nava Barak, speaking at the opening event, said Leah Rabin was courageous and a "powerful source of inspiration."

Barak said she was overwhelmed by the outpouring of support for Israel at the GA, adding that this is needed now more than ever. She urged the audience to "get out the word about what is really happening" and to see themselves as "soldiers in the front line of the battle for hearts and minds."

Although her husband is prime minister, Barak's story is "similar to that of thousands of women in Israel whose fate is interwoven with that of their men," she said. "Through several wars and frequent waves of terrorism I prayed for Ehud to return home safely."

She also made a point of noting that she feels "for the Palestinian children who have been thrust into the line of fire and lost their lives."

Nachman Shai, chief co-ordinator of information policy at the Israeli Foreign Ministry, spoke to the press in a separate meeting. He emphasized that Israel is committed to the peace process. "We are going to continue as much as possible... but for the time being it looks like we don't have real partners for peace, only for violence – and if it comes to violence, we know how to respond."

The prospect of war has increased, he noted. "It doesn't mean we are going to a war tomorrow morning, but in order to avoid war, you have to be ready for it... We have to settle this violence down as soon as possible."

Speaker Jacob Frenkel, governor of the Bank of Israel, was lauded by UJC chair Charles Bronfman for his policies that have maintained the worth of the Israeli shekel in recent weeks.

Sunday morning, Nobel prize-winner Elie Wiesel said he "felt let down" by recent events in Israel. "I still do. Those who worked for peace were hurt, and still are."

Wiesel offered questions rather than answers: Will Jerusalem ever be free of violence? What must be undertaken to make it stop serving as pretext for hostility and bloodshed? What is our role, our duty, towards Israel? How can our solidarity be expressed? Should we go there, as some of us did? Is that enough? Is that the thing to do? Is our protest loud enough?

Canadian contingent includes 80 from Montreal

What about the 13 Jews in Iranian prisons? Have we forgotten them? What about the Falash Mura in Ethiopia who are sick, starving and desperately in need of solidarity? Are we going to abandon them? What will happen in Jerusalem? Is it still possible to envisage a situation where Jews and Palestinians would live together in peace as we had hoped?

Sometimes the questions themselves contain the answers, "and that is my hope," he said at the end of the discussion.

Jews in Israel need us, he said. "They need help, hope and strength." He also mentioned the importance of helping non-Jews in need.

Never before has the GA met at such a critical time, Wiesel noted.

His co-speaker, Benjamin Barber – a political scientist, author and Rutgers University professor – said it's not just Israel that's at risk, but international democracy. When democracy is defined in terms of materialism and consumerism, those who oppose materialism and the consequences of global markets – which are often dire for poor people – feel they must also oppose democracy, he said.

"We have to think not only about solidarity with Israel, but solidarity with people everywhere," said Barber, adding that he knows anti-Semitism can live even in the shadow of democracy. "But also know," he cautioned, "that pogroms require the true darkness of tyranny to be successful."

Truly democratic nations rarely come into conflict, he said.

Other highlights of the weekend included an address by author Herman Wouk, and concerts by singers Neshama Carlebach and Noa on Saturday night; and by pianist Michael Feinstein and Israeli singer Aviv Geffen on Sunday.

The families of the three IDF soldiers – two Jewish and one Druze – who were kidnapped by Hezbollah last month met with media and with students, to stress the importance of support from the Diaspora.

"You must shout clear and loud about this unhumanitarian act," said Haim Avraham, father of Binyamin, whose 21st birthday is next month. "We want as parents to know what happened to our children, how they feel. We know they were injured. We want to know if they eat, if somebody cares for them, who took them, and when they will release them."

The Canadian contingent included 80 people from Montreal – 45 students and 35 adults. Among the other Canadian communities represented were Toronto, Kingston, Windsor, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Ottawa and Atlantic Canada. The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal was the only Canadian federation among 17 that received UJC campaign awards.

Jewish presence in Congress to increase

By SHARON SAMBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON – The Jewish presence in Congress will increase slightly as a result of this week's elections, despite the loss of at least one Senate seat and the upset defeat of a longtime Jewish representative, Democrat Sam Gejdensen of Connecticut.

Jews will hold at least nine seats in the new Senate - and a 10th if either Lieberman winds up retaining his Connecticut seat or the state's governor appoints a Jew to replace him, in the event that he becomes the first-ever Jewish vice president. Either way, this represents a decrease from the current 11, with the retirement of Frank Lautenberg after 18 years.

In addition to Lieberman, the two other Jewish senators up for re-election, Dianne Feinstein and Herbert Kohl, both won.

In the House of Representatives, the number of Jews serving will increase, from 23 to at least 27 - and possibly as many as 29. Two races where Jewish challengers threatened incumbents were still too close to call as of last week. In New Jersey, Jewish Republican Dick Zimmer was battling Democrat Rush Holt to regain the seat Zimmer once held. And in Florida, Democratic Jewish challenger Elaine Bloom was struggling to unseat Republican incumbent E. Clay Shaw.

Aside from these races, there are four new Jewish members of the House: Eric Cantor, Susan Davis, Steve Israel and Adam Schiff. And Jane Harman returns to the seat she once held, after defeating Republican incumbent Steven Kuykendall.

Arafat to conference: Intifadah will go on

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Speaking to the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) in Doha, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat vowed recently that the Al-Aqsa intifadah will continue.

"Despite the heavy human losses which exceed more than 200 martyrs and over 9,000 wounded, our people are determined, more than at any other time, to continue their holy struggle in the Al-Aqsa intifadah with the help of our brothers and friends," Arafat told the 56-member OIC.

The meeting in the Qatari capital, which began Sunday, is the OIC's ninth conference, and the first one in three years.

In addition to delegates representing the world's 1.2 billion Muslims, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan is taking part in the conference. The meeting, during which Iran is to formally hand over the OIC chair to Qatar, is being devoted primarily to the Israel-Palestinian conflict.

Officials from Jordan, Turkey and Egypt have worked in recent days to soften extreme, anti-Israeli proposals prepared for the conference by delegates from Iran, Syria, the Palestinian Authority, and elsewhere.

Speaking at the conference, Arafat described Palestinian protests during the past six weeks as "an uprising of truth and justice, and a yearning for freedom and independence from the claws of the brutal Israeli occupation."

Arafat insisted that violence was initiated by Israel as a response to his own refusal to compromise during the ill-fated Camp David summit. Israel aggressively engaged in violence, Arafat asserted, "after we clung to our people's rights to their land and to holy places and holy Jerusalem at the Camp David negotiations."

Captured Israeli likely dead: Lebanese paper

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — At least one of the three Israeli soldiers captured by the Hezbollah on the Lebanese-Israeli border last month was badly injured.

The soldier would have likely died within half an hour unless he received treatment, a Lebanese newspaper yesterday quoted UN sources as saying.

The English-language Daily Star quoted a UN Interim Force (UNIFIL) source as saying there was a considerable amount of blood found in one of the two cars used to transfer the soldiers after the ambush.

The unnamed source told the paper that if the amount was from one person, then he would have been in critical condition and would have needed treatment in less than half an hour. If the blood was from two people, they must both have been seriously wounded, he said.

Israel has said that blood samples from the scene showed that all three soldiers were wounded during the kidnapping which occurred on Oct. 7, but their precise medical condition could not be determined.

Hezbollah gunmen bundled the three soldiers into the back of a white Nissan and a black Range Rover which were later abandoned and found by UNIFIL troops. The UN source said the Range Rover was soaked with pools of blood.

Assad meets with top Iraqi official

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – Syrian President Bashar Assad met in Damascus last Thursday with Ezzat Ibrahim al Duri, a key aide to Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. Assad and Duri, who is vice-chairman of Iraq's Revolutionary Command Council and considered the country's second-in-command, discussed bilateral relations, the situation in the Palestinian Authority and the upcoming Islamic Conference Organization meeting in Qatar. Duri brought greetings from Hussein.

This was the first meeting between the two and the first at such a high level of contact since their countries severed relations some 20 years ago.

The thawing of relations that began in 1997 led to the creation of offices in Damascus and Baghdad.

Assad, who became president in July following the death of his father, spoke with Iraq's vice-president, Tariq Aziz, after his inauguration. Iraq hopes to re-establish full diplomatic relations with Syria in the future.

Police: Arabs were killed by fellow demonstrators

By SHARON GAL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – A special police team set up to investigate the deaths of two Nazareth residents in violent clashes last month reached a preliminary conclusion that they were accidently shot by fellow Arab demonstrators. The investigation will be completed once a re-enactment has been made at the site.

On the eve of Yom Kippur, Oct. 8, hundreds of Jews from Upper Nazareth rioted on the eastern outskirts of Nazareth. In response, Arab residents went out and confronted the Jews. A large police force kept the two groups apart and later in the evening clashed with Arab demonstrators.

At some stage, two of the Arabs, Omar Akawi, 42, and Wassim Yazbek, 26, were shot to death and three were seriously wounded by gunfire.

Local police commander Moshe Waldman told Ha'aretz last week that "according to our investigation, the shots came from the direction of the Arab demonstrators. Possibly, they were accidently fired by someone unskilled in handling guns, causing the deaths and injuries."

He emphasized that the investigation had ruled out the possibility that the shots came from either the Jewish rioters or the policemen. Waldman added that the team will nevertheless re-enact the incident to complete its final investigation, "like the army enacted the incident in which 12-year-old Mohammed al Dura was shot."

But Bassal Ara, whose brother Fadi was badly wounded in the clashes, told Ha'aretz that "people standing next to Fadi saw the policemen shooting, although it was dark and we cannot rule out that shots were also fired by the rioters from Upper Nazareth."

The week in Israel

Nov. 6

• The families of three Israeli soldiers abducted into Lebanon by Hezbollah last month arrived in New York to highlight the plight of their sons' situations.

• Israeli security forces arrested a Syrian man who had sneaked into the Jewish state. The man, carrying two knives, told investigators he was intent on helping the Palestinian uprising.

Nov. 7

• Israel announced it is creating a state commission to investigate the killing of 13 Israeli Arabs by police at the start of the Palestinian uprising some six weeks ago.

Nov. 8

• The widow, parents and brothers of Vadim Norzhich, the reserve duty soldier who was lynched in Ramallah three weeks ago, are suing the Palestinian Authority and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat personally. Norzhich's family filed a suit for NIS 64 million (approximately $16 million) in Jerusalem District Court.

Nov. 9

• The Israel Defence Forces cancelled authorization for a large prayer service at Rachel's Tomb in Bethlehem today, the anniversary of the matriarch's death, after receiving information on Wednesday that Palestinians intended to attack the site.

Nov. 10

• The PLO's Fatah vowed to take revenge against Israel's Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz for the killing of senior Fatah activist Hussein Abayat, 37, yesterday. Two women standing nearby were also killed in the attack. Eight people were wounded, including Palestinian intelligence official Khaled Salahat.

'Unstable' Chechen hijacker gives up in Israel

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The hijacking of a Russian airliner to southern Israel last weekend has ended after the lone Chechen hijacker, described by authorities as "unstable," surrendered and released all 58 passengers and crew unharmed.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, who was on the way to the United States, ordered his plane to turn back to Israel. After the incident was resolved on Sunday morning, he resumed his flight to Washington for a scheduled visit with President Bill Clinton.

The chief of staff of the Israel Defence Force, Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz, later called the incident "a good exercise for the army and security forces."

But Israel's attitude was far from dismissive when it received the initial reports several hours earlier that a plane en route to Moscow from the Caucasus Mountain region of Dagestan had been commandeered and the hijackers were demanding to be flown to Israel.

Israeli security went into high alert.

Tensions were further fuelled by concerns – later disproved – that the motive for the hijacking was linked to the current Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

When the plane arrived in the region after refuelling in Baku, Azerbaijan, Israel initially refused it permission to land. However, after the pilot warned that his fuel was running out and the hijackers were determined to land in Israel, the plane was directed to the southern airport of Ovda, north of Eilat, under escort from the Israeli air force.

"The initial responses were negative, since we saw no reason to pick up this hot potato and as far as we knew, there were no Israelis on board or any reason to get involved," Maj.-Gen. Giora Eiland, head of the IDF's operations branch, told a briefing afterwards.

But after the pilot said he had little fuel left, "we decided to take the appropriate steps," said Eiland.

Located next to an air force base in the Arava desert, Ovda was the scene of another hijacking crisis five years ago, when a steward on an Iranian domestic flight ordered the plane flown to Israel, where he later demanded political asylum. The passengers returned to Iran and the steward now lives in Eilat, after serving a jail sentence for the hijacking.

This time, the hijacked Russian plane landed at Ovda around 6 a.m. Shortly afterward, the hijacker disembarked and began direct negotiations with Israeli security officials.

"We could quickly see that he did not look like someone entirely sane," Eiland said. "He was talking about his concerns over the takeover of the white race by the yellow race," and "he showed us a videotape with basically the same message. But at this point, it was not clear if he was the lone hijacker. And we knew there were arms on the plane, not only because he said so, but because the pilot said so as well."

Arnalhan, who was eventually seized by Israeli security forces, said he entered the cockpit with a dummy bomb resembling a blood pressure meter.

Israeli security forces still proceeded with caution to ensure there were no more hijackers or explosives on the plane.

Light arms, including pistols, which had been in the possession of the pilot and two Russian security guards, were taken off.

The pilot then disembarked, and when his report resembled the story told by the hijacker, the passengers were allowed to get off and arrangements made for their return to Russia.

Among those on the plane were the Dagestani finance minister. But reports said it was not clear whether the hijacker knew that he was on board.

Hamas leader broadcasts call for 'armed struggle' on Radio Palestine

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin used the PA controlled Radio Palestine last Sunday to repeatedly urge the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza to "transform the intifadah into an armed struggle against the Israeli conquest."

He promised that "selective attacks" by Hamas militants against Israeli targets were "coming soon."

Talking to reporters at a press conference at his office in the Gaza Strip, Yassin said that "it is stupidity to believe that stones can defeat rifles, helicopters and tanks."

He called on the Palestinians to "exchange stones for grenades" as "the only language that the Israeli enemy understands is the language of force."

The Sheikh's words were broadcast several times throughout the day on Radio Palestine, which is under the direct supervision of the PA. The PA has previously refrained from broadcasting messages from Hamas leaders.

Sheikh Ahmed Yassin

Meanwhile, a bullet hit a car in the convoy of UN Human Rights Commissioner Mary Robinson as she visited the West Bank town of Hebron Sunday, an aide said. It was unclear who fired at the three-vehicle convoy, but Robinson – the former president of Ireland – was not in the car hit by the bullet, according to the aide.

No one was hurt in the shooting but a reporter at the scene said Robinson appeared to be upset.

She was touring the West Bank and Gaza to investigate complaints by Palestinians that Israeli soldiers have been using excessive force against Palestinian stone-throwers and gunmen. The shooting erupted shortly after Israeli soldiers and Palestinian gunmen exchanged fire in a nearby area.

Torontonian shares his photos of Fab Four in book and exhibit

By RICK LEVINE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Many people can say they have had a "brush with greatness" but an Emmy-Award-winning, Toronto-based producer/director has enough to pen a book.

It was December 1967 when Paul Saltzman, then almost 24, journeyed with backpack and Pentax to India in hopes of "finding himself".

By coincidence he ended up spending several personal and intimate days with the most famous entertainers in the world – the Beatles–and he has the pictures to prove it!

Now reproduced in his book The Beatles in Rishikesh (Viking Studio) the prints are on exhibit at Wagner Resenbaum Gallery.

It was 30 years after his experience in India, that Saltzman's daughter, Devyani, asked " Dad, didn't you once tell me that you met the Beatles in India in the '60s and you took some pictures of them?"

After locating the cardboard box containing the forgotten ektachrome slides, Paul felt the need to share the photographs and the anecdotes that unfolded with them.

"I am having a great deal of personal pleasure sharing these photos with the public".

Ringo watches John and Paul compose Obla di Obla da. This picture is taken from the book The Beatles in Rishikesh.

"They were remarkably unaffected by their fame and fortune. They were friendly, playful, humorous, relaxed and at ease.

In the book's foreward, Steven Maycock of Southeby's London writes, "The intimacy of these frames is quite remarkable-some of the best I have seen. These images provide a significant addition to the detail of what is a relatively little-recorded episode in the career of the most important rock group the world has known",

During his stay at the retreat in 1968, Saltzman also photographed Mia Farrow, her sister Prudence, Donovan and Mike Love of the Beach Boys. Everyone was there for the same reason: "to learn transcendental meditation and find inner peace".

"My life was changed through this experience, through meditation, finding the inner me, reaching a balance in my life, opening the door".

The author writes of sitting alone and listening to the 24- year old George Harrison playing the sitar and of photographing Lennon and McCartney composing Obla di Obla da.

Images capture Lennon and Cynthia in the last days of their marriage. Many of the songs written by the Beatles for their famous White Album during that stay at the ashram "were modeled after other guests; including Dear Prudence, Sexy Sadie and The Continuing Story of Bungalo Bill."

After reading the book you may find yourself asking if Saltzman was the inspiration for the lyrics to the song Rocky Raccoon.

Saltzman lives in Toronto and produces and directs films. His Beatles in Rishikesh exhibit continues at Wagner Resenbaum Gallery, above the store Arts on King at 169 King St ., 2nd floor in Toronto (416 -777-9617) until November 26.

TRAVEL NOTES FROM ALL OVER

Armchair travellers will hail the advent of the Internet site www.jewishroutes.com, which bills itself as "the single most significant addition to the Jewish travel and leisure market."

From their offices in Manchester, England, the Jewish Routes team attempts to convey detailed information about kosher restaurants, synagogues, museums and other destinations of Jewish interest around the world. The Web site also boasts a "last minute" section for spontaneous tourists seeking good deals on hotels, restaurants and other commodities.

Another site that will prove of interest to anyone planning a trip to Israel is Museums On Line, located at www.ilmuseums.com. The site lists about 150 Israeli museums in English, Hebrew and Russian, with brief descriptions and visiting information.

Hebrew Union College: The HUC's Jewish Institute of Religion is marking its 125th anniversary with an exhibition featuring the works of 500 unique works of art, designed to be used in rituals enhancing the sacred moments of Jewish life. The show is called Living in the Moment: Contemporary Artists Celebrate Jewish Time.

"Artisans eagerly explore the symbolism of their heritage and extend themselves to the highest levels of craftsmanship," said curator Laura Kruger of the 144 artists represented in the show.

The exhibit is being displayed simultaneously at two separate locations through June 2001, at the HUC-JIR Museum, One West 4th St., New York and at the HUC-JIR Skirball Museum in Cincinnati.

On A Clear Day: The Azrieli Centre in the heart of Tel Aviv, consists of two towers in the shape of a circle and a triangle. A third tower in the shape of a square is currently under construction. The two existing buildings, developed by Canadian David Azrieli, are the tallest in the Middle East.

The 49th floor observatory in the circular tower offers perspectives of Israel's landscape — east to Jerusalem, west to the Mediterranean, south to the port of Ashdod and north to the Carmel Mountains. Telescopes connected to computers enhance the visual sweep.

When fully completed the Azrieli Centre complex will house a shopping mall, multiple movie theatres, 40 restaurants and the Meridien Tel Aviv hotel. Azrieli, an Order of Canada recipient, heads Canpro Investments Ltd. of Montreal. He built Israel's first enclosed shopping mall in a Tel Aviv suburb 14 years ago.

Laromme Renamed: One of Jerusalem's finest hotels has undergone a change of name. The former Laromme Hotel is now called the Jerusalem Inbal, the result of "a technicality following the end of our management contract with El Al," explains Omri Krongold, the hotel's long-serving general manager. Virtually every other aspect of the hotel remains the same. Email: hotel@inbal hotel.co.il.

Brazilian Discovery: Brazilian archeologists excavating the buried remains of a centuries-old building in Recife have uncovered a well that has been determined to be a mikvah, thus establishing the building as a synagogue. It is believed to have been the Kahal Zur Israel Synagogue (Rock of Israel), which flourished in the mid-1600s during the brief period when the Dutch controlled the lucrative sugar and tobacco plantations.

The building is believed to be the remnants of the oldest synagogue in the Americas, dating from 1630. The Brazilian Jewish community, which numbers about 170,000, hopes to renovate it and establish a museum, to be known as the Cultural Center of the Jewish Presence in Brazil.

During the short-lived Dutch period of colonization, which ended in 1654, Recife had as many as 1,400 Jews, a Jewish community that exceeded Amsterdam's in size. After the Portuguese gained control, many Jewish colonists resettled in the West Indies, and some ended up at a fledgling Dutch colony called Nieuw Amsterdam — also known as New York.

Keeping the Faith deals with controversy sensitively

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

A movie which created a little controversy when it was first released was recently released on video. Keeping the Faith, a comedy, features Jenna Elfman Ben Stiller and Edward Norton.

It deals with a rabbi (Stiller) and a priest (Norton), who have been lifelong friends, and who both fall in love with the same woman (Elfman).

The priest has taken on oath of celibacy and cannot act on his emotions, and the rabbi is expected to marry but the girl is not Jewish. This is one of the few times when a Hollywood film about Jewish/non-Jewish romance is handled with some sensitivity.

In keeping with the title of the film, the rabbi does not forsake his faith in order to get the girl.

The other controversy in the film surrounds the representation of single Jewish women. Some women were offended, while others felt it was somewhat accurate of Jewish women in a certain social strata in New York city. It was taken to an extreme in this film in order to create a comedic situation.

Either way, the film is funny and very entertaining, but it is only available on a rental basis – unless you want to buy it for $100 to $150. If you wait a few months, the price will come down.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE HARBOURFRONT AUTHORS FESTIVAL

Two contrasting views of the novel are among the many impressions that remain with this roving reporter after attending the International Festival of Authors last month at Harbourfront.

Irish novelist John Banville, known for his fine dark prose in books such as Ghosts, disparaged the novel as an outmoded vessel that cannot carry much light. "I don't really like the novel, it's not a very interesting form to work with, but I can't do anything else," he said in a public interview.

"The novel is a big, chunky, clunky form to work with. It's really hard to be subtle. It was really invented in the 19th century… A lot of critics have said that it's not really an art form. As Henry James said, 'It's a loose, baggy monster, you can put anything into it.'"

In a public interview, Swedish novelist-poet Kjell Espmark, who sits on the committee of the Nobel Prize for Literature, defended the novel's power. "There's been much talk about the novel being in crisis right now," he said. "I hope this crisis goes on. If the novel wasn't in crisis, I would be scared stiff."

I asked Espmark to comment on the committee's decision to award the Nobel to Yiddish writer Isaac Bashevis Singer in 1978. "With Singer, it marked the breakthrough of a new policy in the Nobel committee to give the prize to great unknown writers," he said. "Singer was then known primarily to a small audience in New York. After the Nobel he became known to a much larger audience around the world and was translated into 35 different languages."

As expected, the Festival presented a spectrum of literary treats. Ursula K. Le Guin gave superb insight into the process of literary creation, Joanna Trollope gave a wonderful reading and Maeve Binchy showed why her books, such as Tara Road and Scarlet Feather, are such huge best-sellers. Binchy, who is Irish, is a born storyteller and blessed with the gift of the gab, as she proved in her hilarious introduction.

Other impressions: New York intellectual Susan Sontag repeatedly pushing her hair from her face as she read from her latest novel, In America; Binchy's mostly female audience, emboldened by necessity, taking over the men's washroom; Harry Potter author J.K. Rowling casting a spell over thousands of children at the Skydome.

Most memorable moment: Mordecai Richler, after an intermission, re-entering the theatre where he was being feted for his literary accomplishments, only to have an usher ask him to remove his alcoholic drink to the lobby. Festival director Greg Gatenby corrected the faux pas by returning the drink to Richler at his seat.

Congratulations to Gatenby for another stimulating festival.

'Collective memory' inspires dance

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A survivor separated from his daughter at the liberation of Auschwitz found her in Toronto 53 years later.

"I can't tell you anything more about him because he imposed himself on me about two years ago," said Serge Bennathan, choreographer of The Invisible Life of Joseph Finch, presented by Dancemakers at Premier Dance Theatre, Nov. 21 to 25.

Serge Bennathan

Son of a French mother and Jewish Algerian father, Bennathan, 43, says it is "collective memory" that inspired the dance, which he first thought of as a short book. He did not lose any of his own family in the Holocaust.

"It's a big mystery to me, I can't tell you anything more.

Festival pays tribute to Richler

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The International Festival of Authors opened its 21st season at Harbourfront recently with an evening in tribute to Montreal author Mordecai Richler, famous for such novels as The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, St. Urbain's Horseman and Barney's Version.

As several speakers observed, Richler gave his many readers an ironic and irresistibly funny picture of Jewish life as lived in the old ghetto of downtown Montreal.

"My father was an ardent fan of Mordecai," said writer Barbara Gowdy, who said he stopped being a WASP after reading a Richler novel. "He would speak to us kids in a Yiddish accent and refer to us as 'goys,'" she said. "My father would say, 'As there is only one Madonna and only one God, there is only one Mordecai."

Novelist Guy Vanderhaege, growing up in a prairie town, said that he found inspiration in Richler's vivid portrait of Montreal Jewish society. "If Mordecai Richler could make an obscure street in Montreal so vibrantly alive in my imagination, just maybe I could do the same with my piece of territory."

Film director Ted Kotcheff recounted episodes from his 44-year friendship with Richler, including scenes from their days when they roomed together in London in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Richler's routine was rigid, Kotcheff recalled. Each day, he typed on an old Olivetti solidly from 9 to noon, then from 2 to 5 in the afternoon.

"If I waited for inspiration to strike I'd never write a single bloody word," Richler explained.

At the debut of the Kotcheff-directed film The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz at Montreal's Place des Arts, Saidye Bronfman congratulated Richler, saying, "Well, Mordecai, you've come a long way from being a St. Urbain Street slum boy."

"Well, Saidye, you've come a long way from being a bootlegger's wife," Richler reportedly replied to the wife of the Seagram's founder.

"Like Queen Victoria, she was not amused," Kotcheff said.

Journalist-writer John Fraser recollected the various phony faxes that he and Richler sent to each other as gags. When Fraser became master of Massey College, Richler faxed him a request for additional supplies of the college's silverware and candlesticks, which he claimed to be selling at good prices in London. "That silver belongs to the college!" one official upbraided the new master in genuine anger.

Alison Gzowski read remarks that had been prepared by her absent father, Peter Gzowski, the retired CBC broadcaster and one-time editor at Maclean's magazine.

Gzowski said that Richler once flew from London to Ottawa on assignment for Maclean's, which wanted him to cover a Grey Cup football game. However, the weather was so cold that he watched the game on television in his hotel room.

"Trudeau," said retired American broadcaster Robert McNeill, formerly of Montreal, "was one of many events to excite Canadians in the 1970s. Another was Richler's return to Canada, having learned it was easier to make a reputation outside of Canada than within it."

According to McNeill, Richler brought much more than "literary bad manners" to Canadian letters.

"He thrust into our consciousness an early view of multiculturalism that nobody was talking about back then...He gave us a larger sense of ourselves, like a Saul Bellow who stayed Canadian."

"There is no other voice in Canadian literature like Richler's," he said. "I devoured his books with joy. They were books that explored Canadian identity in a bawdy, delicious way."

The tributes, broken by an intermission, lasted well over an hour. Then came Richler's concluding remarks. So much had been left unsaid, he joked. "Nobody noted that when I was obliged to spend 10 days in the Montreal General Hospital in the summer of '98, the nurses voted me the most cheerful and undemanding patient they had ever encountered."

The Invisible Life of Joseph Finch

"It is something ingrained in me for a long time. Perhaps it is due to my experiences and the people I have met."

Joseph Finch is someone created by the choreographer. "The dance ends when he discovers his daughter. He is worried that he will not live long enough to write his memoirs."

Bennathan says the same motive drove him to choreograph The Invisible Life of Joseph Finch. He thinks that with Holocaust survivors getting older and dying, there will be nobody left to tell what happened.

Born in L'Aigle, France, Bennathan says his own father, Alfred, was harassed as a Jew in Algeria, but never had to hide. Alfred married Regina in France, and joined the French armed forces. Serge left home at 14, and after travelling around the world of dance, became artistic director of Dancemakers in Toronto in 1990.

Bennathan's parents visited Toronto recently and saw rehearsals for Joseph Finch.

He had read essays by Elie Weisel and books by Saul Bellow before he began to work on The Invisible Life of Joseph Finch.

It is the first time he has used the Holocaust theme in a Dancemakers project, though a previous work, Sable/Sand, dealt with his Jewish roots.

A brief text will help the audience and the story will also be narrated from the stage by the eight dancers.

Trauma medicine saving victims of violence

By WENDY ELLIMAN
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — While international news correspondents are busy covering the violence that has once again engulfed Israel, the country's hospitals and researchers at its leading institutions are busy saving lives and limbs.

"More than 80 Palestinians hurt in the clashes have sought help here in the past weeks," says Hadassah Medical Organization spokesperson Ron Krumer in Jerusalem.

"All but four were lightly injured and released within 24 hours. But we've also seen far more serious injuries: an Israeli woman from Betar, deeply concussed by a stone; Rabbi Chaim Brovender, dragged from his car and beaten by a mob; Shimon Ohana, the 19-year-old soldier on patrol in the south Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo, shot in the chest."

Medics found the massively bleeding Ohana without pulse or blood pressure. "We can't resuscitate him! Should we bring him in?" they radioed.

"Bring him," replied Prof. Avi Rivkind, head of the trauma unit.

"Time can literally make the difference between life and death at this point," said Rivkind, Israel's first trained traumatologist.

"His heart lacerated, Ohana was fighting the first of three peaks of death among trauma victims."

Trauma has only lately received long-overdue recognition as a surgical disease affecting many of the body's systems, and for unfortunate reasons, the Israelis have taken ownership of its treatment, exporting their expertise worldwide. (Hadassah recently signed an agreement with the Argentine National Guard to set up Buenos Aires' first trauma centre.)

Defined as 'multiple injuries violently and suddenly produced,' it is the leading cause of death in under-40s, and follows cancer and heart disease in its mortality rate for all age groups combined. A specialized trauma centre can reduce death from trauma by a third.

Sirens howling, the ambulance rushed the seemingly lifeless Ohana to the trauma centre. Thirty units of blood including unmatched type O, to save time, were pumped into him.

When the young man's pulse finally fluttered, he was taken into surgery, where the entry and exit holes cut through his left ventricle by a bullet were closed. Two further operations in that first 24 hours repaired damage to his lung and diaphragm. Two weeks later, Shimon Ohana lies unconscious in intensive care, his chances of survival 50:50.

While Israeli hospitals provide immediate treatment, the country's research institutes are looking for yet more effective ways to repair damage done by man and nature.

One promising technique, developed at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa, could mean survival for 'crush syndrome' victims – those who initially survive bomb blasts despite being crushed under debris but die soon afterward as a result of toxins that leak from their badly damaged muscles.

Minerals and myoglobin seep from crushed muscles into the kidneys, and potassium makes its way from injured sinews into the bloodstream, causing heart and kidney failure, explains Technion nephrologist Prof. Ori Better.

By massively infusing crush victims with 15 litres a day of a special solution of saline, bicarbonate and synthetic sugar, "we're able to maintain the body's normal fluid balance and stem the leakage," he says.

A possible treatment for spinal cord injuries is emerging from research at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, where scientists are using cells rather than drugs to repair spinal damage.

Two known facts led them to this approach: first, that spinal injuries stubbornly refuse to heal and can even spread; and, second, that special types of white blood cells (macrophages), used for repair and healing everywhere else in the body, are very scarce in the central nervous system. They thus took macrophages and put them to work in the spinal cord, using a method developed by Weizmann neurobiologist Prof. Michal Schwartz.

Intensive research is also under way at Ben-Gurion University's two teaching hospitals for alternative dressings for skin injuries, including growing the patient's outer layer of skin (epidermis) in the laboratory.

Non-Jewish French-Canadian researcher delivers lecture in Yiddish

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A non-Jewish French-Canadian gives a scholarly address in Yiddish!

Yes, it happened at the Jewish Book Fair when Pierre Anctil, a Montreal researcher, spoke in faultless Yiddish on Jewish life in Montreal. He even translated questions from the audience in English into Yiddish so everybody could follow his answer.

Anctil was applauded by the 140 Yiddishists at the Leah Posluns Theatre when he said his Yiddish had a Litvack accent.

But this was disputed by Prof. Ben Shek who told The CJN that Anctil pronounced some words like tsain (teeth) with a German flavour. Ben Kayfetz chimed in that the speaker had given a Polish accent to some words.

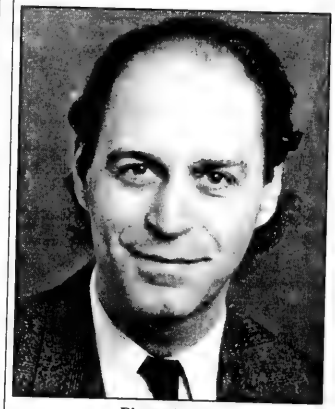
Vivien Felsen, who introduced the speaker, launched her own paperback English translation of her grandfather's book, Montreal of Yesterday: Jewish life in Montreal 1900-1920.

The book, which was originally written in Yiddish by Israel Medres, had been translated into French by Anctil.

In 55 short chapters, Felsen said her grandfather's book, now considered a valuable social and historical review of Montreal Jewry, covers every aspect of Jewish immigrant life.

Vivian Felsen



Pierre Anctil

A sociologist and senior researcher at the Archeological and Historical Museum of Montreal, Anctil said it is essential to understand the Yiddish language to appreciate Jewish culture.

He got interested in learning Yiddish when he discovered from friends that there were 50 serious writers in Montreal whose works were available only in Yiddish.

Anctil has also translated into French the history of the Jewish labour movement, works by J.I. Segal, Yehuda Elberg and H. Wolofsky.

Felsen and Anctil are now working on translating her grandfather's second book, Tsvishin Tsvey Velt Milkhomes (Between Two World Wars.)

Israel Medres and his book, Montreal fun Nechten, is being featured by CBC-TV in the series A People's History in an episode to be broadcast in the fall of 2001.

Israeli team finishes second in Skate Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Who'd have thunk it?

A couple of years ago, it would have been inconceivable to suggest that an Israeli ice-dance team would beat the very best Russian, American and Canadian duos – and then go on to challenge the world champions.

Who would have believed that an Israeli pair would, by all accounts, outskate the champs, only to finish as runners-up in a major world event?

Yet that's exactly what happened at the MasterCard Skate Canada international competition in Mississauga last week.

The quick-footed Israeli ice-dance team of Sergei Sakhnovsky and Galit Chait finished second at Skate Canada, just behind the reigning world champions on the scorecard, but ahead of the flamboyant French team in the estimation of many in attendance.

The second place finish is the highest yet recorded by the Israeli team outside their home rink in Metulla and could have been even higher, except for some lenient judging that failed to penalize Marina Anissina and Gwendal Peizerat, the world champs, for an out-of-sync sequence in the original dance.

The Israelis' performance drew warm rounds of applause from the knowledgeable crowd at the Hershey Centre in Mississauga, a community next door to Toronto.

For the hard-working and very ambitious team of Sakhnovsky and Chait, second place puts them on pace to meet their goal of winning a medal at the World Championships in Vancouver next March. That would be a remarkable achievement, considering that only two years ago they were in the middle of the ice dance pack with a 13th place ranking.

Last year they vaulted to fifth in the world, itself a laudable achievement. They started the current season intending to show their improvement was no fluke. "We wanted to skate well," Chait said, and "show the jump from 13th to fifth was right," chimed in Sakhnovsky.

"From fifth to higher is more difficult," he continued. "If we go up, it's great."

Chait and Sakhnovsky were second after the compulsory portion of the program, and never looked back.

They hung onto second after the original program, even though many ice-dance aficianados believed the French team had stumbled and performed with a lack of co-ordination. They maintained their second place status after the free dance. They couldn't catch the world champs, who went on to win their seventh consecutive international meet.

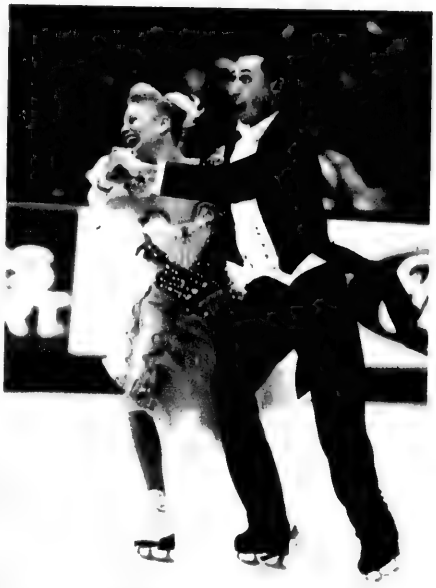
Fauna Mandel, who taught figure skating as a volunteer at Metulla's Canada Centre ice rink three years ago, said the Israeli duo "were an incredibly strong technical team with an enthusiastic expression on the ice."

Their hallmark, which was noted by television commentators, is their "incredible speed and footwork that is intricate and extremely quick," she said.

At Skate Canada, the synchronicity between Sakhnovsky and Chait was plain for all to see.

As Mandel noted, "their unison was extremely precise. Their footwork was so difficult that a slip up by either would have thrown off their entire program."

The fact they did not make a mistake and they performed their dance routines at such a high speed "set them apart," Mandel said.



Speed and precision marked the performances of Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovsky. [Marc Evon photo]

Their only drawback, as noted by the TV experts, was that they could use a little more polish and experience, she added.

The Israelis – like any team attempting to make a name for themselves – faced an uphill battle when they started out. Ice dance judges are known for their fixed attitudes.

"You have to be around, make your mark and pay your dues" before you can move up in the judges' estimation, Mandel said. "The fact they moved up so quickly proves they really made a mark on international judges."

Sakhnovsky and Chait have been skating together, on and off, for about five years. Coincidentally, their rise through the ranks corresponds to their association with Tatiana Tarasova, a renowned skating coach who works with some of the best ice dance teams in the world.

"She changed our style," Chait said. "She let us branch out to different directions, try new choreography and show expression in our dancing."

Like others in the world of ice dance, Chait and Sakhnovsky were brought together specifically to compete (Anissina, for example, is Russian, though she skates for France).

Sakhnovsky, 25, started skating for CSK, the army club in his native Moscow, at age eight. In 1993, he won the junior World Championship in Seoul, South Korea, and was named a Master of Sport.

A year later he decided to leave Russia behind and try a new start in Israel. It looked for a time as if he was giving up his career, "but life is life," he said.

When he got to Israel, he ventured up to Canada Centre in Metulla and within a few months, hooked up with Chait as his partner.

Chait, also 25, was born in Kfar Saba to Russian parents and moved to New Jersey as a young girl. Her first memory of skating was in Rockefeller Centre in New York City. She also skated in Skyrink in New York (located in an office tower), as well as in the nearby town of Monsey. She trained with the late coach, Carlo Fassi.

Her best result was a sixth place finish in ice dance in1993.

A coach suggested she consider Sergei as a partner and "we clicked quickly," she said. "At the time, Sergei was much better than I was. He taught me how to do better."

Both skaters are expressive and Chait believes their similar personalities give them a special chemistry on the ice. "We both like to be very theatrical and tell a story while we're skating," she said.

Sakhnovsky and Chait train most of the year in Connecticut but will be back on home ice in Metulla in December for the annual Skate Israel competition. That event usually attracts an excellent level of international competition, though Canadians and Americans generally give the event a miss. In the past, however, three-time world singles champ Alexei Yagudin has performed in Israel, as have top teams from across Europe.

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

Torn Postcards

The following story was shared with me by a close friend, Carla Wittes, and will appear in her upcoming book, Until My Last Breath....

The book contains excerpts of the last letters written by Holocaust victims before they perished.

"Three sisters and one brother lived in Lodz, Poland along with their mother. One of them, Bronia, married Abram Steinberg, who escaped to Russia in 1940 while Bronia and their little son Elliot remained in the Lodz ghetto.

"At first, Bronia was able to write postcards to Abram. Her sister Luba remembers sitting beside her when she wrote them.

" 'She cried as she wrote to him. And I was so naive. I wasn't married, I didn't have children. I used to say to her, why are you crying like that? One day you will see him. One day you will be together. Why are you crying? Little did I know how she felt.'

"Once the ghetto sealed off from the rest of the world, there could be no further communication between Bronia and Abram.

"After the war, Abram Steinberg made his way to Palestine. While searching lists of Displaced Persons, he found the names of Luba and Hela, his wife's two sisters who had survived.

"It was then that he learned what had happened to Bronia and Elliot. Elliot was seized in an aktion. Bronia was murdered in Auschwitz together with her mother and brother.

"Luba visited Abram in Israel some years later. During their emotional reunion, he showed her his only remembrance of Bronia: two postcards, filled with her small, precise script, that Luba had watched her write.

" 'A girl like my sister, she was so intelligent. I should let it go, that she died, like she never existed? He had two full cards.'

"Luba desperately wanted some remembrance of her sister.

" 'He went like that,' " Luba makes a ripping motion with her hands, " 'and he gave me one half, and he kept the other.'

"She gazes wistfully at the torn, fragile scraps of paper.

" 'He wanted to hold on to her. I don't blame him. I don't think he ever recovered from the loss of my sister.'

"Luba brings one of the fragments to her cheek and holds it against the warmth of her skin. She looks at them often, reading them, touching them.

" 'She wrote these cards. And I remember when she wrote them.' "

Since the time Carla shared this story with me, she has accompanied me on several March of the Living programs to Poland and Israel. She knew that Abram had died several years ago, but while in Israel, Carla attempted (thus far unsuccessfully) to trace Abram's son Yossi and find the other halves of the missing postcards.

When I first heard this story, I told Carla that her work was symbolic of the effort of all those committed to teaching the lessons of the Shoah.

The Holocaust, in many ways, tore our world apart. It ripped a huge swath in our faith in the Divine, in the meaning and purpose of life, in our belief in humanity, in our belief in ourselves.

What is our response to this breach? Like Carla, who is trying to find the missing remains of the postcards, all those involved in Holocaust education – young and old, survivor and second generation – are dedicated to rebuilding and reuniting the shattered fragments of our world.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Being a businesswoman who is on the road a lot, I often find it convenient to meet with clients in restaurants rather than my office.

I can't begin to tell you how often my meetings are plagued by the poor behaviour of small children and even poorer behaviour of their parents.

Sitting in a booth, I am sometimes accosted by a child standing in the booth behind me, playing with my hair and making faces at my client. When I ask the accompanying parent politely to handle the situation, I am more often than not snubbed and ignored.

I have asked waiters to help out and all they seem to want to do is move me to another table. Why am I the one who needs to be inconvenienced? The offending tot and guardian are the ones who should be moved. Don't you agree?

Seen and not Heard

Dear Seen and Not Heard,

Doing business on the road has its pros and cons. As you stated, the convenience of popping into a restaurant nearby can save both you and your client valuable time; however, it sounds to me as if you may not be discerning enough when you choose a restaurant for your meetings.

Perhaps do a bit of investigating on the area you plan to be in and stay away from family type establishments. I think your chances of running into small children in a more elegant type of restaurant is less likely in the middle of the day. These places are usually more expensive and cater to a business crowd. The problem with places like these is that if you frequent them often enough, it could really cut in to your income. A small coffee shop might be an idea to investigate.

Just keep in mind that if you choose to meet at a family restaurant you can expect to run into just that – families. This usually means with kids. Not all parenting will meet with your approval. Don't try to change them; the changing in this case has to be done by you.

Solidarity Edition

Campaign surpasses $33 million

Campaign 2001 - The Campaign For Our Children - entered its third month in high gear, with more community activities than ever and record results. "We've reached this milestone because our volunteers are so motivated by the need to help Jewish children," said Harry Krakowsky, who, with Judy Engel are Campaign Vice Chairs. "Our donors are responding so generously because they recognize these tremendous needs as well," added Engel.

The Calling For Kids Telethon week, at the end of October, raised $568,000, bringing the current campaign total to more than $33 million, just over 12% or $13.5 million more than last year at this time.

At last week's annual Major Gifts Dinner, chaired by Barbara and Jay Hennick, Campaign Chairs Ron Frisch and Ed Sonshine thanked the record crowd of nearly 500 donors for their unwavering demonstration of community strength and unity at a time when Jewish solidarity is so important.

Acclaimed lawyer and civil libertarian Alan Dershowitz, the keynote speaker, urged the Toronto Jewish community to be steadfast in its support for Israel and to let its leaders and the media know how it feels.

The following morning, Dershowitz addressed more than 100 judges and lawyers at a breakfast sponsored by the UJA FEDERATION Lawyers & Accountants Division.

The Women's Campaign & Advocacy's sold-out program, Connections, brought 500 women together to hear clinical psychologist and business consultant Dr. Lee Hausner share strategies for preserving Jewish values in an affluent society, last week.

Global Real Estate in the New Millennium: The Israelis are Coming and the Canadians Have Landed, sponsored by the Real Estate Cabinet on November 15, will give a first-hand look at growing investment by Canadians in Israel and Israelis in Canada. On November 23, the Goods and Services Division will join the Entertainment and Marketing Division for a tour of the innovative and award-winning Umbra home accessories facility. Additional information is available by calling 416-635-2883 ext. 177.

Keeping up the month's momentum, Outlook 2001, UJA FEDERATION's annual networking event for lawyers, accountants and members of the investment community, will feature Claudio Morfe, General Counsel, Global Professional Services for Nortel Networks. For more information, call Phyllis Feldman at 416-631-5733.

The next Telethon Week, December 3 - 6, is already taking shape. To volunteer, call Clare Adam at 416-635-2882 ext. 184.

Sharing leadership skills

Last week, a delegation from UJA FEDERATION Young Leadership Cabinet journeyed to Israel to share its expertise and support in helping young adults establish a young leadership initiative in our Partnership 2000/Project Renewal community of Eilat/Eilot.

Hands-on solidarity

Just days after UJA FEDERATION's Solidarity Mission to Israel returned home, a second Toronto contingent set off. UJA FEDERATION's Partnership 2000 (P2K)/ Project Renewal committee turned a planned consultation trip into a combined solidarity effort, meeting with members of Toronto's P2K and Project Renewal communities in Eilat/Eilot, Kfar Gvirol and Kiryat Moshe.

"I'm surprised by the extent to which the Israeli people have expressed their gratitude for us being here, because, to me, it seems like the place we should be right now," said committee member and participant Les Klein.

Udi Gat, Chair of the Hevel Eilot area, praised the Toronto contingent at a program which included UJA FEDERATION young leadership from Toronto and their Israeli counterparts. "You are heroes because you came, you cared and you proved we're one community," he said.

"The entire program has become a solidarity statement," said P2K/Project Renewal Co-Chair Warren Kimel.

Terrorists attack school bus

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

KFAR DAROM, Gaza Strip — A wire-operated artillery shell ripped into a school bus shortly after 7:30 a.m. on Nov. 20, killing two adults and wounding nine others, including children.

Kfar Darom resident Miriam Amitai, 35, a mother of four and a school teacher, was one of the two people killed in the attack. She was buried later in the day in the West Bank settlement of Ofra. Gavriel Biton, who had been accompanying the children to school, was also killed in the attack. He was buried in Yerocham.

2 dead, 9 injured

Five people were seriously wounded in the attack, including three children from the same family. They are Orit Cohen, 12; Yisrael Cohen, 8; Tehilla Cohen, 7; Liora Alper, 30; and Rachel Asraf, 34. Two of the Cohen children each lost a leg in the blast, and another lost an arm.

Lightly wounded in the attack were Nurit Difani, 39; Matanya Difani, 12; Rachel Hadad, 8; and Yehuda Baninu, 41, the bus driver.

The security cabinet swiftly began an emergency meeting, and the Knesset and the IDF said they will respond to this first fatal bomb attack on settlers in Gaza in almost two months of clashes with the Palestinians.

Thirty children, teachers and escorts were passengers in the bus, which was making its way from the settlement to a school in Gush Katif when the attack took place.

Stockwell Day

Jean Chrétien

CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat and reporter Ron Csillag interviewed Day in his Toronto hotel room for about 15 minutes, the day before immigration minister Elinor Caplan alleged that the Alliance is a magnet for "Holocaust deniers, prominent bigots and racists."

The CJN's interview with Chrétien was by telephone, and lasted roughly seven minutes. It took place the day after Caplan's remarks.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Election Guide

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress has released its guide to issues in the federal election. They include anti-Semitism and domestic manifestations of the Mideast conflict; other international issues, such as Iran, anti-Semitism and terrorism; Holocaust remembrance, including a national Yom Ha'Shoah day and a free-standing Holocaust museum; child poverty; refugee and immigration policy; and Nazi war criminals in Canada.

ISRAEL

Teacher Re-Instated

JERUSALEM — Israel's Education Ministry is allowing a Jewish educator to resume teaching after he was barred from Haifa schools for calling on colleagues not to teach Yitzhak Rabin's legacy or hold memorial services marking the former prime minister's assassination. Prior to his reinstatement, Yisrael Shiran distributed a letter of clarification, condemning the assassination and saying educators must differentiate between the moral aspects of the murder and Rabin's political legacy.

Family Sues

JERUSALEM — The family of a soldier lynched by a Palestinian mob last month in Ramallah is suing the Palestinian Authority and its president, Yasser Arafat. The family of Vadim Nourezitz, one of two soldiers killed by the mob, said the Palestinian police made it known to the public that it was holding the soldiers.

Prayers Allowed

JERUSALEM — Israeli troops allowed right-wing legislators to hold prayers at Rachel's Tomb near Bethlehem last week after initially barring the services due to security concerns. Earlier, leading rabbis had urged worshippers to heed a ban on praying at the shrine, which has been a focal point of clashes with Palestinians in recent weeks. Nov. 9 marked the anniversary of the biblical matriarch's death.

WORLD

More Aid?

WASHINGTON — The White House is expected to send a request to Capitol Hill for an additional aid package for Israel. The Clinton administration wants Congress to give $450 million this year to Israel for military purposes and to help defray the cost of its withdrawal from Lebanon. The White House also wants to give an additional $225 million to Egypt and $75 million to Jordan.

Casino Fired On

JERICHO — The Israeli army fired on the Oasis Casino here last week after Palestinian gunmen used the building to fire on an Israeli settlement and army position in the area. Palestinians in Jericho said the shelling damaged an upper floor of the building, which was built amid high hopes for the peace process.

School Opens

BERLIN — Germany's first rabbinical school since the Holocaust was inaugurated last week. Abraham Geiger College, located near Berlin, is expected to graduate about five students a year to lead religious services in European Jewish communities.

Trial Delayed Again

LOS ANGELES — A trial date has been postponed again for a white supremacist accused of wounding five people in a shooting rampage at a Los Angeles Jewish community centre and killing a postal worker in August 1999. Lawyers said the complexity of the case against Buford O. Furrow Jr. makes it necessary to delay the trial until April 24, 2001.

Cemetery Attack

SARAJEVO — Vandals overturned about 30 tombstones at the historic Jewish cemetery in this Bosnian capital. Jewish community leaders said it was the first such incident since World War II. Police in Sarajevo detained four teenagers who confessed to the desecration.

Shul Dedicated

CHELYABINSK, Russia — A new synagogue was recently dedicated in this Russian city, home to about 10,000 Jews. The governor of the region donated $70,000 for the new shul.

Pop Star's Woes

RABAT — A Moroccan court has sentenced a Jewish pop star to three years in jail and fined him $13.3 million because he did not have the necessary papers to take foreign currency abroad when he tried to leave Morocco earlier this month. The fine against Cohen Pinhas, who is well-known in North Africa and France, came after Morocco suspended low-level diplomatic ties with Israel to protest what it considers the Jewish state's harsh treatment of the Palestinians.

Holocaust Bill Passes Under Different Name

EDMONTON — The Alberta government last Thursday passed a bill that recognizes and will commemorate the Holocaust each Yom Hashoah.

The bill was passed swiftly and without debate. However, its name was changed after ethnic and religious groups complained it ignored victims of other genocides.

The legislation, originally called the Holocaust Memorial Day Yom ha-Shoah Act, was changed to the Holocaust Memorial Day and Genocide Remembrance Act.

The decision was made to make the legislation more inclusive, community development minister Stan Woloshyn said.

"It honours the six million Jews who died in the war, but it also honours the millions of other people who lost their lives during other tragic times," he said.

Since the province announced its intention to mark the Holocaust, representatives from Ukrainian and Islamic communities have complained that other people suffered genocide during and after World War II.

Woloshyn said the name change would encourage Albertans to recognize the Holocaust and consider other instances of systemic violence, genocide, persecution, racism and hatred.

"I've had calls saying this diminishes the impact of the bill and I've had calls saying they are fine with the change," said Gillian Horwitz, spokesperson for the Jewish Federation of Edmonton.

Angry readers, advertisers boycott the Star

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Anger at the Toronto Star's Middle East coverage has boiled over in the Jewish community, resulting in a subscription boycott as well as a move by at least two major advertisers to pull full-page ads.

The Star has responded with a letter sent to former subscribers, explaining the newspaper's coverage, while John Honderich, the Star's publisher, has met with one of the advertisers in a bid to change his mind.

Canadian Jewish Congress responded to Honderich's letter, taking the Star to task for "one-sided" editorial and op-ed pieces.

John Fuss, president of Incredible Electronics, pulled two full-page weekly ads costing $23,000 while Howard Sokolowski, CEO of Tribute Communities, one of Canada's largest home builders, removed one ad, worth between $16,000 and $20,000, which it has run in the Saturday edition for the past 18 years.

Both advertisers cited unbalanced coverage of the Middle East as reasons for their actions. Fuss said he has removed his ads indefinitely while Sokolowski said his action was, for now, a one-time event.

At the same time, a young businessman who declined to have his name used, said he and a small group of friends have been spearheading a campaign to convince Star readers to cancel their subscriptions.

The man said his group, Canadians Against Media Defamation (CAMD), has printed more than 5,000 flyers containing cancellation forms, and distributed them along Bathurst Street. The flyers have "sold out" and he has been asked to provide more, he said.

Based on that response and on conversations with members of the Jewish community who are livid at the Star's coverage, he estimated that more than 5,000 Star readers have cancelled their subscriptions.

Honderich rejected suggestions that thousands of subscriptions have been cancelled.

"I have no idea of the numbers, but I can assure you there have not been thousands of cancellations," he said. "I know of no other cancellation of ads."

Sokolowski said he and his partner, Al Libfeld, president of Tribute Communities, "felt that whether it was successful or not, we wanted to make a statement.

"I'm uncomfortable with a lot of the coverage the Star has given the Middle East situation. I'd settle for them being impartial. I see them as pro-Palestinian."

Fuss and his niece Alyssa Schwartz met with Honderich.

"We feel their coverage has not been fair," Fuss said. "I feel that the Star would have to give us fair coverage and show both sides of the coin. If someone tries to hurt us, it's only right to fight back."

Regarding a suggestion that advertisers should not try to shape a paper's editorial content, Fuss said, "I agree a paper should not tailor its news to satisfy advertisers, but if I feel they're not being fair, I don't have to advertise there."

Schwartz, 24, asserted the Star's Middle East coverage has been one-sided in favour of the Palestinians for quite some time. "Over and over again, it's 'Israeli is the oppressor victimizing the Palestinians.'"

Since the recent escalation in the conflict, the Star's op-ed page has failed to give both sides equal representation. "There's only been one pro-Israeli article since it started around Rosh Hashanah," she said.

Schwartz, who recently graduated from Ryerson's journalism program, believes the Star's news coverage is slanted as well.

Abraham comes alive

Two weeks ago, as a guest of El Al Airlines and the Israeli Ministry of Tourism, I spent four days touring Israel. This article is the second in a three-part series describing some of the highlights of that visit.

From the editor's desk

Jewish tourists are very difficult to find these days in Israel. This is very sad for Israelis at a number of levels, not least of which is economic – but only partially economic.

Most Jewish tourists from North America have cancelled vacation plans to Israel as a result of the outbreak of Palestinian violence. Of the 800,000 tourists expected to visit Israel during the final quarter of the year, only approximately one third, some 250,000, will actually arrive, according to Tsion Ben-David, the head of the North American desk at the Ministry of Tourism.

The virtual disappearance since Rosh Hashanah of the Jewish North American visitor will cause a loss to the Israeli economy over the next month and a half of nearly $1 billion (US).

It is already the subject of ubiquitous discussion among Israelis and the cause of some puzzlement and, I would add, even sadness. The absence of Jewish tourists in Israel is especially poignant because, by contrast, Christian tourists abound.

Jerusalem in particular is where the absence of tourists in Israel is seen and felt most. The downtown streets still bustle with bumper car-like, pedestrian movement but there are far fewer people than usual crowding the four-way intersection at Jaffa and King George streets and the city's hotel lobbies are quiet sanctorums rather than chummy meeting places for old friends or long lost relatives.

Jerusalem has indeed lost a great many North American tourists. But that is not only a loss for Jerusalem; it is certainly in equal measure, a loss for those tourists. For Jerusalem is a place of never-ending discovery – in both the broadest and narrowest meaning of the word.

As anyone who has ever visited Jerusalem can attest, the uniqueness that attaches to this place is palpable at every turn of the road or rise in the valleys. Yet Jerusalem is indescribable at the same time. The pine-scented air of the forested hills, the quality of afternoon light and the cool, crisp evening air are the miracles of God. But there are also wondrous "miracles" of man to behold here.

One such miracle is the Bible Lands Museum Jerusalem, an architecturally understated, low-lying, stunning structure on the very same promontory as the Israel Museum, overlooking the Givat Ram valley with its inspiring view of the Knesset.

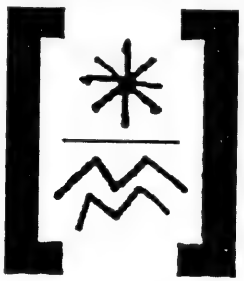
The museum is rare among museums anywhere on earth. It is dedicated to a single pedagogical objective, movingly articulated by the museum's engaging public relations director, Amanda Weiss, "to connect the visitor (Jewish or non-Jewish) to our biblical history by seeing and learning how people actually lived in biblical times."

To achieve this objective, the museum designers, engineers and curatorial staff have created an eye-popping, at times, goose-bumpy, multi-sensory, educational experience.

The museum houses some 4,000 objects, rare archeological artifacts all, the actual materials and utensils of daily life from the lands and civilizations whose names we read in the Tanach. The visitor "strolls" back in time, from pre-patriarchal to post-exodus eras, curiosity churning, senses hyper-aware and intellect aglow with the illuminations of countless inner "light-bulbs turning on."

Suddenly Abraham's courage comes alive; one understands with greater insight the revolutionary grandeur of his ethical monotheistic vision. One feels more directly, the weight of the decision by Jacob to leave the beloved pastures of Canaan for the unknown alleyways of Egypt. One sees with greater clarity how history turned forever towards law and freedom when Moses descended the mountain. In this museum, one understands, sees and feels a great deal more.

Founded in 1992, the museum is the creation of Warsaw-born, Italian, French, Swiss and Canadian-educated Elie Borowski, a character about whom an epic Hollywood film could be made: freedom-fighter, daring, courageous, bold, visionary, scholarly and deeply humane.



Official symbol of the BLMJ.

Borowski's hopes for the museum are inscribed just outside the entrance: "To prepare our hearts to discern/To harken, to learn and to teach/To know our past/To understand and to love each other/And adore knowledge and the glory of God/To walk in the path of peace."

The symbol of the Bible Lands Museum Jerusalem (above) is inspired by Genesis: the separation of the waters and the creation of the heavens, the earth and the depth of the sea.

Few surprises in GTA municipal vote

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There were few surprises in the municipal elections last week, with Jewish incumbents, led by Mayor Mel Lastman, winning re-election handily.

Two races were notable: Milton Berger, a fixture on the municipal scene for over two decades, lost the race in Ward 16 to Anne Johnston, also an incumbent. The two councillors were pitted against each other because of the re-drawing of ward boundaries.

Erin Shapero...in

And in Markham, Erin Shapero, a 25-year-old environmental activist, will become the first Jewish woman to sit on the town's council.

Toronto council mainstays Mike Feldman, Howard Moscoe and David Shiner won easy re-elections with 82, 58, and 82 percent margins, respectively.

Lastman's nearest rival, Jewish environmental activist Tooker Gomberg, picked up over 51,000 votes, or eight percent of the total.

In races for trustee on the Toronto District School Board, Sheine Mankovsky was acclaimed in Ward 5. Gerri Gershon and Shelley Laskin both coasted to easy wins in their wards.

Joe Mihevc, a theologian and expert on the Holocaust, easily beat Rob Davis in the heavily Jewish Ward 21. Both were incumbents. Allegations of anti-Semitism leveled against Mihevc marred the race. It's thought that a public endorsement of Mihevc by Rabbi Gunther Plaut aided in his win.

In York Region, Vaughan Ward 5 councillor Susan Kadis beat former councillor Bernie Green by a 3,000-vote plurality. Richmond Hill Ward 3 councillor David Cohen defeated his rival by a 12 percent margin. Howard Shore, who stood for election in Markham's Ward 1, lost by nearly 2,000 votes.

Milton Berger...out

Alan Shefman, a former director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, won an easy victory in Vaughan's Area 2 for a trustee's seat on the York Region District School Board.

Berger, 72, was resigned to his defeat.

"Win or lose, what can you do?" he asked.

Berger was first elected to North York's council in 1976, and served for seven terms. He chaired every standing committee of the former city's council, and was also a member of Metro Toronto's council from 1978 to 1988.

Shapero, on the other hand, was positively giddy at her win in Markham's Ward 2.

"I feel wonderful," she told The CJN. "It shows that the people of Markham are concerned about environmental issues."

Shapero was one of three candidates vying to fill the seat left vacant by councillor Randy Barber, who stepped down after two terms. She won with 63 percent of the vote.

Environmentalist Erin Shapero wins in Markham

Ward 2 is bound by Steeles Avenue to Highway 7, and from Highway 404 to Bayview Avenue. It has a sizeable Jewish population.

Shapero ran mainly on an environmental platform, pledging to protect green spaces and water. At most, 15 percent of the ward is undeveloped, and she wants to keep it that way.

An environmental studies graduate of York University, Shapero says she will be a full-time councillor, having left her job as executive director of Public Spaces, which promotes sustainable urban planning.

She's looking forward to being the freshest face on Markham's council in years, saying her youth and religion will not hold her back.

"It's important to have diversity represented on council, and my voice will be heard."

David Bedein with a Palestinian map of Israel and the territories in which Israel has been replaced by a Palestinian state. [Paul Lungen photo]

TORONTO — Canadian taxpayers are footing the bill for a United Nations relief operation that supports the Palestinian claim for a "right of return" as well for Palestinian textbooks that flout the Oslo accords, an Israeli researcher and journalist asserted last week.

David Bedein, bureau chief of the Israel Resource News Agency (IRNA), told a group of journalists during a visit to Toronto that Canadian aid workers in refugee camps actively encourage Palestinian aspirations to return to homes and villages in pre-independence Israel.

The camps are administered by UNRWA, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, and Canada contributes about $17 million towards UNRWA's $400 million budget, he said.

The Canadian liaison office in the West Bank city of El Bira provided Bedein with a PLO brochure that calls for a right of return while Canadian workers in the camps have helped organize bus tours to Israel to show Palestinians lands that are subject to their claims, he said.

"We're not talking about the West Bank, we're talking about Israel proper, all the places they left in 1948 and expect to go back to," he said.

In a recent article, Bedein wrote that "Canadian workers in the UNRWA camps join with other UNRWA officials in organizing daily lessons on the 'right of return' that include the new textbooks that are funded in part by the Canadian government that inculcate a new generation of Palestinian Arabs to return to Jaffa, Haifa, Lod, Ramle, Tzfat (Safed) and more [all within pre-1967 Israel]."

Citing an Aug. 3 New York Times article, Bedein pointed out that UNRWA officials allowed 25,000 Palestinian youngsters to use their schools during the summer as military training camps where children aged eight to 16 were shown how to prepare Molotov cocktails, set roadside bombs and throw stones.

Bedein noted that Canada chairs the Refugee Working Group, one of five working groups under the Madrid peace formula that explores a resolution to the Palestinian refugee problem and which is set to resume discussions.

"Those of us who have covered this have noticed a clear and consistent Canadian support for the right of return and a clear and consistent support for the flow of money" to those supporting that right of return, he said.

"Canada is taking a position in favour of refugees' right of return… Basically, it's a program to replace the State of Israel with Palestinian refugees… For Canada, the test of its objectivity is to see how far it distances itself from that policy," he added.

Palestinian aspirations for a return to lands inside Israel are promoted in school textbooks, Bedein stated.

He referred to new Grade 1 and Grade 6 texts, which he acknowledged had removed the word "jihad" (holy war) but which "continue to talk about the destruction of Israel in a more subtle way. It's a blueprint for an Islamic state."

Palestinian education, which is controlled by the Palestinian Authority, is funded by aid from Western donor nations, including Canada.

Bedein asserted the Palestinian education program "has primed, groomed and brainwashed these children to become willing volunteers for death and martyrdom."

Similar inflammatory statements can be found on the Palestinian radio waves, Bedein said.

As violence flared in the last two months, IRNA stepped up its monitoring of Palestinian radio stations. The pattern set since Oslo has continued, with Arabic language statements by Palestinian leaders aimed at a domestic audience varying greatly from their pronouncements in English to the wider world, Bedein said.

No Palestinian leader has yet called in Arabic for a two-state solution and Palestinian maps continue to show Palestine as encompassing all of Israel. "I'd get a Pulitzer Prize if I could show anywhere in the Palestinian media where Arafat accepted a two-state solution," he said.

Foreign Affaris spokesperson Valerie Noftle responded to CJN queries with a prepared statement. She said "we are confident that Canada's programs in the Palestinian territories do not fund anti-Semitic education materials. It is our understanding that the Ministry of Education in the Palestinian territories has been working to upgrade their curricula and textbooks. Through the Dialogue Fund, Canada supports programs to bring together Palestinian and Israeli history teachers to discuss educational issues."

Turning to the right of return, Noftle said "Canada believes the solution to the refugee issue must be resolved between the parties directly concerned, and bilateral negotiations are the best way to resolve the situation."

Rabbi urges Jews and Palestinians to coexist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It should be no more tolerated for Jews to incite hatred against Palestinians than it is for Palestinians to incite hatred against Jews, says the director of the Israel Religious Action Centre.

"We are destined to live together, and there are bound to be ways, [if not to embrace], then to coexist," said Rabbi Uri Regev at a recent lecture co-sponsored by Holy Blossom Temple and ARZA-Canada, the Canadian association of Reform Zionists.

It is not a bright prospect to exist with swords, he said. "I see peace, not as a means of enjoying life, but as a virtue for its own sake."

He speaks as a resident of Jerusalem and as a father whose son will soon be entering the army, he said.

"The question is not how to contain the current violence; we cannot turn the other cheek. I am not sure, though, if we must use the means currently being used."

He admits to not being a strategic expert but "I hope that ways can be found to deal with the stones and rioting, and [at the same time] bring down casualties."

When dealing with the enemy, it is important to remember "that human relationships deteriorate from harsh words to knives to stones to guns. The escalation of warfare is fast."

To stop that cycle, we must try to suppress our natural urges and hope the cycle can be reversed, said Rabbi Regev.

Many Palestinian children are brought up to hate Jews, and even with a new school curriculum, "the text books – though not as anti-Semitic as before – do not have Israel on their maps.

"I do not believe this is the only Muslim voice that exists. I attended a recent conference where I met Muslims who placed emphasis on human dignity and peace. Why are we not aware of this side of Islam?"

The large number of clergy in Israel that have taken part in interfaith dialogue have been disappointed, he said, "because that counter-voice is not heard. That voice, however, is essential.

"When this current violence subsides – and it will subside – refuse to label all Palestinians or Israeli Arabs into one basket. Work hard to find allies [among them]."

He wonders what life would be like in Israel if the "original dream had been realized. We made good on the Law of Return, but the truth is that 52 years into the history of the state, scores of Arab villages are still without facilities. We as liberal Jews have a role to play."

If we ask Israelis how to be good Jews, they will say it is by keeping Shabbat and going to synagogue, said Rabbi Regev. "God says in Genesis, however, to do what is right and just.

"We are the only country that still denies Jews the freedom of religion; I am not able to officiate a marriage officially because I am a Reform rabbi. As well, hundreds of thousands of Jews from the former Soviet Union cannot marry in Israel because they do not have a Jewish grandmother. They are all granted citizenship under the Law of Return, but they cannot marry in Israel."

This is not the Israel that was envisioned in the Declaration of Independence, he said. "We have to understand that this dream of a model society is rooted in liberalism, justice and peace. It is not a luxury, it is prerequisite of a healthy, just society."

If we are able to strengthen and support the liberal movements in Israel, we will "strengthen the country and open a new page that will give us a way to coexist."

Canadians, now choose!

The election campaign has dwindled down to its last few days and now only a handful of days of electioneering remain. On Monday night, Canadians will choose their next federal government, thus, thankfully, bringing to an end an election campaign that will be remembered more than any other in recent times, sadly, for its low level of substantive discussion and its high level of personal, ad hominem attack.

After 37 days of saturation election coverage by all the daily news outlets, electronic and print, one of the key conclusions to which we are ineluctably drawn, is how unhelpful the campaign, as presently structured, is for the voter.

The highlight of the campaign should have been the leaders' debates, an opportunity to hear the contending leaders, in their own words, put forward the main planks in their respective policy platforms and then defend those planks against the reasoned but respectful counter-arguments of their opponents.

But, as all of us who watched the so-called debates, or even part of them, can attest, the "debates" were not "debates" at all, but childish, churlish, schoolyard-level bickering. We would never accept such intemperate, incontinent public behaviour from our own children; why should we then, from our political leaders?

But the "debates" were only a symptom, not the problem of campaign coverage in the modern age. The real problem, especially so in the electronic media, and to a lesser degree in the print media, is that news reportage has become a form of entertainment.

Given the ease and the freedom with which a viewer can and does switch back and forth among the competing channels, the networks must find compelling ways by which to hold the viewer's attention. Thus news programs, election coverage in particular, must rely more heavily on factors that entertain rather than inform: explosive graphics, colourful visuals, background music, and shorter and shorter snippets, often the most controversial, if not the most representative, of actual policy statements.

Furthermore, in our parliamentary democracy, election coverage, by necessity, is essentially coverage of the daily campaign stops of the party leaders. Thus each party gears the main focus of its electioneering efforts to the needs of the networks.

These then are the conditions that give rise to the artificial, unhelpful structure we call an election campaign. But it need not be this way. We therefore urge the parties and the networks to review the present format to try to bring about a method of news coverage that facilitates a campaign truly helpful to the voters.

Until then however, Canadians, experienced and wise in the ways of our politicians, will choose our next federal government, despite, not because of, the election campaign.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Eggleton emphasizes commitment

I want you to know that my commitment and that of my government to a safe and secure Israel is firm and unshakable.

After learning of the UN Security Council vote on Resolution 1322, I immediately made representations to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and the cabinet based on comments that I received from some constituents who were angry and disappointed. As a result:

- Chrétien has issued a statement of regret for the distress and frustration caused to many by Canada's support for the resolution, and he has reiterated his personal friendship for Israel and the government's support for a peaceful and secure Israel.
- He has assumed a more direct involvement in the process of determining Canada's vote on such resolutions. Since then, Canada has not supported two subsequent resolutions and has received the thanks of the Israeli government.
- After meeting with Canadian Jewish leaders, Chrétien has taken the important step of establishing a direct method for them to discuss concerns with his office in advance of any UN votes, or on any other issue.
- The prime minister has personally intervened to seek the release of Israeli soldiers held hostage in Lebanon.

Urges no 'liberal' conclusion

Let's draw some conclusions from the facts, before we react in our usual way to anything called "liberal."

Which party was in power when:

- Canada absolutely refused to admit Jews during the Holocaust?
- Canada censured Israel after the Suez War, and later?
- Canada was condemned by the UN for its non-funding of alternate community education? This at a time when government coffers are bursting with excess tax dollars.
- Canada condemned Israel at the UN?

Think past narrow issues

The news that some Jews are financially supporting Stockwell Day and are planning to vote for the Alliance party is deeply disturbing. The reasons most frequently cited for this trend are to punish the Liberals, either for the party's support of the recent UN resolution, or for the party's contention that private school funding is a provincial issue.

Jewish support for Day must be put into the broader context of who Day is – his evangelical Christian beliefs and his stance on issues such as gay rights, capital punishment, abortion, gun control, even deeper tax cuts and national standards for services like healthcare and employment insurance – and should not simply be confined to his opportunistic responses to two issues.

If Jews decide to support Stockwell Day, they must think beyond UN resolutions and private school funding and must think about the overall harsh and cruel consequences his party will bring to them, their families, friends and neighbours, and citizens in the wider community.

Why were we not proactive?

Why did we only react to the Liberal government's vote at the UN Security Council? Why weren't we *pro*active in making representations to the government before the voting took place? We knew well in advance of the imminent vote. Were our organizational bureaucrats sleeping on the job?

Shabbat in Stockholm

By RACHEL AND BEN SCHLESINGER

In June of this year we were invited to participate in a conference dealing with family life, held in Uppsala, Sweden.

Uppsala is 40 minutes by bus from the airport at Arlanda. Uppsala University is the oldest university in the Nordic countries, founded in 1477. It has 36,000 students, 2,500 graduate students, and 40 programs of study. The conference terminated on a Friday morning, and we decided to spend Shabbat in Stockholm (80 minutes by bus).

On Shabbat morning we attended services at the Great Synagogue, which is Conservative – Wahrendorffsgafan 3, phone 679-29-00).

Our visit inspired the following reflections on the Jewish community of Stockholm.

History

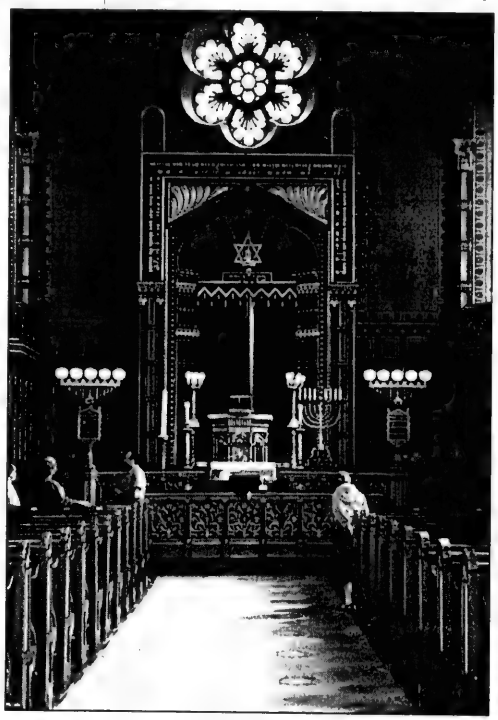
At a dedication ceremony, led by Rabbi Ludwig Lewyston in September 1870, a gas burning eternal light (ner tamid) was kindled above the Holy Ark (Aron Kodesh). The flame (now electrified) has been glowing ever since. While the lamp construction over the ark is from 1870, the cloth decorations around it are traditionally attributed to the time of King Gustav III, around 1792, although no one is really certain as to the truth of this claim.

On the other hand, the eight-branched Chanukah menorah is definitely a gift to the first synagogue. According to the Hebrew text on its stand, the menorah was donated in 1792, after King Gustav III's approval, in whose honour it was dedicated. The Torah scrolls are mostly of 19th-century origin; some of the silver breastplates are older.

The synagogue was designed by the famous Swedish, non-Jewish architect, Fredrick Wilhelm Scholander, in what he considered to be an "oriental style." It is now an historical, cultural treasure and may neither be sold nor altered. The synagogue seats about 950 persons.

Services are held on Monday and Thursday mornings (8 a.m.). The time for Friday evening services depends upon the season of the year: summer 6:30 p.m. and winter 5:30 p.m. Shacharit on Shabbat morning and holidays always begins at 9:15 a.m.

Since its dedication, an organ has been played at Shabbat and Holy Day Services. Men and women were initially separated during the formal worship services but family-seating has now been introduced in one section of both the main sanctuary and the balcony (the Ezrat Nashim, women's balcony).



Facing the Aron Kodesh.

After the Shabbat services, Cantor Gerber invited the visitors to the boardroom to inform us about the Swedish-Jewish community. Cantor Gerber who has been with the synagogue for 25 years came originally from the United States. Before we left for Sweden, my brother-in-law had told me that at a recent family function he had met a relative, Cantor Gerber. Imagine our surprise when we too met that Shabbat, in Sweden!

At the end of the service, the cantor made announcements in Swedish, and then in English. He told the visitors that after Kiddush, he would share information about the Jewish community. What follows, comes from Cantor Gerber, as well as material printed by the synagogue.

The Beginnings

The first Jew permitted to take up permanent residence in Sweden, was Aaron Isaac, a merchant from Germany. He came to Stockholm in 1774. Initially, he was allowed to remain only if he converted to Christianity. He refused, and impressed the Lord Mayor of Stockholm, who advised him to make a protest to King Gustav III.

After many difficulties, he received permission to remain, and brought his family and the quorum needed to hold Jewish worship services (ten men), who also brought their families.

Prior to the new law proclaimed by King Gustav III, only Christians were permitted to reside in this country. An exception to this law was the Island of Marstrand, a short distance from Gothenburg on the west coast, which briefly served as a tax-free port and had a synagogue.

Aaron Isaac and these "founding fathers" purchased land, dedicated a cemetery and employed a rabbi to serve as religious leader and teacher. They also established a chevra kadishah (burial society). Jews could practise only a few professions and were limited in their choice of business. Initially they could live only in Stockholm, Gothenburg and Norrköping.

After several revisions, all limitations to full citizenship were removed by Parliament in 1870. By then the number of Jews had increased to 3,000 through births and new immigration. It is ironic, however, that full rights allowing Jews to settle or live in some areas were not formalized until 1951.

Today there are about 20,000 Jews in Sweden. While immigration at the beginning of this century consisted mainly of individuals or single families, persecution in czarist Russia forced large numbers of Jews into exile. Several thousands came to Sweden between the Kishinev massacre and the end of World War I.

During the 1930s, numerous Jews fled from Nazi Germany, but only 100 settled in Sweden. The largest and most important immigration occurred immediately after World War II, when thousands of survivors were brought from the death camps. About 7,000 remained in Sweden. The majority left for Israel and the United States.

This influx, doubled the Swedish Jewish population. Political events in Hungary in 1956, in Czechoslovakia in 1967 and in Poland in 1968 led to additional Jewish immigration to Sweden.

About 12,000 Jews now live in Stockholm, of which over 5,500 are affiliated members of the Jewish community. A number of community members reside outside Stockholm, in nearby towns such as Eskilstuna, Köping, Uppsala, and Örebro.

The Jewish community of Stockholm is very active and well organized. An elected council of 21 persons is chosen every fourth year. A smaller executive board is responsible to this larger body and some of its members are responsible for various areas of community activities such as social work, religion, administration, finance, and youth activities.

There are several synagogues in Stockholm and on a previous visit we went to Adat Yeshurun. This shul is located in the community building used by the Hillel School. The service is traditional.

On the previous Shabbat, one of the women pointed out that the furnishings were transported from a congregation in Hamburg, Germany – the benches, the Ark and the total wooden interior had been spared on Kristallnacht. It had been brought to Sweden in 1938.

The rabbi of the synagogue in Hamburg was a great uncle of mine, Rabbi Joseph Carlebach. It was a remarkable feeling, sitting on the benches that survived the Holocaust, even if Rabbi Carlebach and much of his family had not.

Nuremberg - a disappointment

The announcement of Nuremberg, a film created to show the trial of Nazi war criminals, received a good deal of publicity. Perhaps my anticipation was greater than it should have been, for when it was all over I was severely disappointed.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The facts presented by the film were quite in order. What went awry was the choice of focus, which should have been on the ultimate evil of Nazism and the Holocaust. To be sure, a few pictures were shown of various concentration camps. But they passed quickly and elicited little emotion.

Instead, Nuremberg highlighted two distinct personalities: Justice Robert Jackson, the chief prosecutor, and Hermann Goering, chief of the German air force, who was often considered Hitler's successor.

Jackson came across reasonably well. He had convictions and a profound respect for the law. But that impression was watered down because of a love affair – the good-looking young lady appeared with him often enough to sidetrack the viewer. I wondered why she was there altogether, except to satisfy a Hollywood belief that without some love affair no film is worth its salt.

The other personality that was highlighted was Goering, and the filmmakers made a serious effort to portray him not merely as a cardboard villain, but as a human being. But this attempt too went awry.

Instead of showing how an intelligent individual could descend to the depths of human depravity when gifted with power, Goering emerged as a rather likeable person. His responsibility as the second man in the Reich was never pursued by the filmmakers.

The fact that, in the end, he escaped the noose by taking cyanide was historically true, but in the film enhanced his image as a victor and possibly a victim unjustly pursued.

There were two other characters that stood out: Albert Speer, the man who built the superstructures of the Reich and the autobahn, the forerunner of the super highways we know in North America.

It did not become clear why, in fact, the judges did not condemn him to death but gave him a prison sentence. He was ultimately freed, published an autobiography and lived out his life in a normal fashion.

Further, Nuremberg was shown as an American enterprise; the Allies played no role, and the one Russian general was depicted as an alcoholic buffoon.

A Jewish psychiatrist who interviewed some of the accused, came across rather well. His summation of Nazism – "Evil is the absence of empathy" is one phrase that remains in my memory.

The movie was shown in two parts, and neither one elicited any emotion. What I saw with my own eyes at Dora, back in 1945, was of a different dimension – evil in the raw.

The film did not manage to show that evil as a reason for the trial or express the hope that no such depravation would ever occur again. Too bad.

Jews and the environment

From where I write, I can see herons perched on the rooftops below me, cormorants swimming in the inlet across from downtown Vancouver, and eagles swooping by, sometimes sitting on the apartment tower behind our house. On the street I might meet a coyote nonchalantly loping along, or, at dusk, a raccoon scrabbling through the garbage cans. Animals have descended on the city, and we enjoy them. But it may be that they have come to live with us because we have destroyed their natural haunts.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

We also see many factors contributing to the demolition of the natural order. Is the environment a Jewish issue? I think so. "And the Lord God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden to tend it and to protect it." (Genesis 2:15) For Jewish environmentalists, this text has become the anchor for activism regarding our coexistence with our planet's other living, growing things.

In Vancouver, that challenge has been taken up by Adam v'Adamah, one of a growing number of faith-based environmental movements.

One of their founders, Avi Dolgin, explains: "The general environmentalist movement has not been penetrating the Jewish community; nor do those groups usually come at issues from a Jewish perspective. We wanted to centre our activity within a Jewish context."

Adam v'Adamah cites the admonition to humankind in Genesis to tend and protect its original habitat. "We want to teach the importance of our resources and of using them wisely," Dolgin ventures. "We want people to realize that everything comes at a cost."

Out west, salmon, the centuries-old basis of life, are at great risk, and the state of our fish stocks is of pressing concern to Adam v'Adamah. "We have no right to drive a species to extinction," says Dolgin. "We have not acted with shomrah, with the goal of protecting living creatures."

Across North America there are at least 20 Jewish environmentalist groups, but Adam v'Adamah is the first to organize in Canada. Its activities have included a Tu b'Shvat seder conducted at the retirement home in Vancouver, an "eco-ethics" retreat and a Sukkot program that visited synagogues, the Jewish high school and Hillel House, raising issues such as the use of pesticides and genetically modified foods. Participants looked at the issues from both an environmental standpoint and a Jewish perspective.

This fall, Dolgin is teaching at Hebrew schools here and in Victoria, bringing environmental issues into the classrooms together with general studies. When Grade 4 at Vancouver's Talmud Torah studied animals and animal adaptations, the class also studied texts relating to tsaar ba'alei chayim, what we would call animal rights. Maimonides taught that hurting animals in any way was against Jewish law. The class looked at treatment of pets, as well as at the rate of species extinction, in light of Jewish law.

The reach of Adam v'Adamah now extends throughout the community. Sponsoring organizations include Temple Emanu-el in Victoria, Or Shalom, Shaarey Tefilah, and Hillel on campus; programs have been done in co-operation with Chabad and Conservative congregations, Beth Israel and Beth Tikvah. The Sukkot program was co-sponsored with Farm Folk/City Folk, a movement to bring producers of food together with consumers.

The destruction of our forests without due reconstruction, the depletion and changes to our fish stocks and the pollution of our great Fraser River are visible to Vancouver residents on a daily basis.

"Jewish tradition and theology teach that we have a responsibility to care for this planet," says Dolgin. "It teaches that we have to take steps to fix the problems we created, to tend and protect species and resources on the verge of extinction."

Stockwell Day and the Jewish vote

Stockwell Day is wooing Jewish voters in Ontario and, particularly, Toronto. And it seems that the Alliance is making inroads into the traditional Jewish support for the Liberal party. Yet pictures of Jews enthusiastically applauding Stockwell Day are somewhat surprising. To Jews in Alberta, they are downright shocking! There is good reason for this: The Jews of Ontario see Stockwell Day, the candidate, the man who wants their vote; the Jews of Alberta know Stockwell Day, the man who, for some time, was the second most powerful individual in the Government of Alberta.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

Two issues are key to Day's attempt to drive a wedge between the Jewish community and the Liberal Party: first, the Liberal Government's support for UN Resolution 1322 – a blatantly biased resolution placing the sole blame for Palestinian violence on Israel. The Canadian Jewish community, coast to coast, is furious with the government and rightly so. Day has been highly critical of Canada's support for Resolution 1322 in an attempt to exploit this fury. Canada's voting at the UN has been problematic for some time, however. In spite of Canada's UN voting behaviour, there has been good co-operation between Canada and Israel as evidenced by the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement and the memorandum of understanding signed by Justice Ministers Anne McLellan and Yossi Beilin.

The second issue concerns public support for religious education. Canada has been cited by the UN Committee on Human Rights because Ontario provides public support for Roman Catholic education but not for education of other religious groups, in this case the Jewish day schools of Ontario. The Harris government has consistently refused to provide equal public funding to non-Catholic religious schools and Jews, particularly in Toronto, are very frustrated. They have seized upon the idea that the Liberal government should do something about this. Day, who wants public support for fundamentalist and evangelical Christian schools anyway, has seized upon this issue in the hopes of garnering Jewish votes. Yet blame for this problem should be placed where it belongs – on the provincial government. Voters should remember that education is a provincial matter and that, in every other province, this issue has been handled without resorting to federal intervention.

These two issues may be persuasive enough for Ontario Jews to vote Alliance but, before rushing headlong into Day's arms, voters should acquaint themselves with his Alberta record. First, Day was at the heart of the severe cuts to health care, public education, and higher education. In Canada's richest province, there are long waiting lists for elective surgery. Baking sales are needed to purchase school textbooks, and university professors are among the poorest paid in Canada.

Of greater concern is Day's lack of respect for individual difference, for the Charter of Rights and for the legal system. Case in point: Day was front and centre in the Alberta government's attempt to limit compensation for victims of the government's own policy of forced sexual sterilization. Day and his colleagues were even prepared to invoke the Notwithstanding Clause to ensure that these unfortunate individuals did not have the option of going to court to obtain fair and just compensation. There was such an uproar over this bill that the government was forced to withdraw it within 24 hours.

Day also played a part in the Alberta government's discriminatory policy towards homosexuals by steadfastly refusing, along with his Cabinet colleagues, to extend provincial human rights legislation to protect them. Even after the Supreme Court of Canada held that the government's failure to protect homosexuals was a violation of the Charter, the Alberta government considered invoking the Notwithstanding Clause to exclude these individuals from constitutional protection. Day and the Alberta government failed to put a stop to a private member's bill which invoked the Notwithstanding Clause to immunize from constitutional challenge a prohibition against marriage between same sex couples.

And then there is the Alliance handbook which suggests that if three percent of voters sign petitions, referendums be held on abortion and capital punishment. In 1999, the Alberta government proposed the Constitutional Referendum Act, which provided that the Notwithstanding Clause could be invoked if it passed a provincial referendum. The effect of Alliance policy, not unlike to the probable effect of the Constitutional Referendum Act had it become law, would be to place the fate of minority rights in the hands of the majority. Under no circumstances should individual rights be subject to the whim of the majority. Governments should not only respect the rights of individuals, they should be the guardians of those rights.

Jews may choose to vote for Day but they should do so with full knowledge of the facts.

The Kirshner File

The Social Credit party and anti-Semitism

Last summer, after Stockwell Day challenged Preston Manning for the leadership of the Canadian Alliance party, Day was asked whether he had once taught in an Alberta school where Jews were described as "children of the devil." Indignantly, Day replied that the accusation was "absolutely, categorically, 1,000 percent false."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Even if that story is baseless, there is hardly any doubt that Day and his right-wing policies inspire fear and loathing among some Canadians, as the Globe and Mail's national affairs columnist recently suggested. "Day is like a throwback to Social Credit," Jeffrey Simpson observed, " that amalgam of evangelical Christianity, political populism and fiscal conservatism that governed (Alberta) for three and a half decades..."

Social Credit swept to power when William "Bible Bill" Aberhart was elected premier in 1935. His successor, Ernest Manning, Preston's father, ruled Alberta from 1943 until Peter Lougheed of the Conservatives broke its grip in 1971.

William Aberhart

During Social Credit's heyday, Alberta was transformed from a have-not province into one of the richest ones. Yet during World War II and the early post-war period, anti-Semitism was a pervasive feature of Social Credit's philosophy, notwithstanding the fact that neither Aberhart nor Manning were overt anti-Semites. Indeed, Social Credit was the only democratically elected anti-Semitic party in Canada at that time.

Its anti-Semitism was based on a cockeyed theory which blamed the world's economic and political ills on an international Jewish conspiracy consisting of, among others, the Bank of England and the Bank of Canada. Viewing the party with increasing alarm, the Canadian Jewish Congress launched a campaign against Social Credit. But it had little impact, claims Janine Stengel in Social Discredit: Anti-Semitism, Social Credit and the Jewish Response (McGill-Queen's University Press). Social Credit, for its own good reasons, reformed itself, as Manning purged it of its disreputable anti-Jewish elements. In Social Discredit, a book based on fastidious research, Stengel takes a fresh look at the party, examining Social Credit through the prism of the Canadian Jewish Congress. It is a useful approach.

Founded in Liverpool, England, in the 1920s by Major C.H. Douglas, a Scottish electrical engineer, Social Credit was wholly dependent ideologically on his paranoid conviction that a cabal of Jewish financiers manipulated economic and political systems to gain world domination. That his hypothesis was inspired by the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the discredited Czarist forgery, is quite obvious.

Aberhart was first exposed to Douglas' works in 1932, but amid the gloom of the Depression, he developed his own brand of Social Credit. His purpose was to liberate Albertans from "the yoke of the present financial system" and to foster "the universally recognized principles of Christianity in human relations." Aberhart embraced Douglas' conspiracy theory, but played down its Jewish dimension.

Major C.H. Douglas

In practice, however, Aberhart expressed contradictory views about Jews and Judaism. At various times, he condemned anti-Semitism and supported Jewish immigration. But he balanced these views with a denunciation of Zionism and a certainty that Jews would be cursed until they accepted Christ. Aberhart's ambiguous feelings allowed anti-Semitic feelings to permeate Social Credit, Stengel writes.

Like his Christian fundamentalist master, Manning never included the word "Jewish" in his excoriations of the so-called international financial conspiracy. Yet the party's house organ, Today and Tomorrow, published explicitly anti-Semitic material, and one of Social Credit's members of parliament, Norman Jaques (Wetaskiwin, Alberta), was a blatant anti-Semite who read excerpts of the Protocols into Hansard.

By 1939, the Canadian Jewish Congress considered Social Credit's anti-Semitism to be a serious problem, and tried to stop it. But Congress was hard-pressed to form a coherent, unified response. Congress' Western vice-president, Louis Rosenberg, argued that Social Credit's anti-Semitism was more than the fulminations of a radical fringe and actually represented official policy. A Congress delegation asked for, and received, a meeting with Aberhart. In the course of their discussions, Aberhart denounced anti-Semitism and racial hatred and promised to squelch Social Credit's anti-Semitic tendencies.

Norman Jaques

Despite these assurances, Aberhart did not take any concrete action against Jaques and Today and Tomorrow. That prompted Rosenberg to declare, "The only difference between Aberhart and Jaques is that Jaques repeatedly inserts the word 'Jewish' between 'international financiers,' whereas Aberhart omits (it), leaving you to guess."

Ernest Manning

With Aberhart's death, Manning took over the premiership of Alberta, but Congress was still convinced that anti-Semitism was deeply ingrained in the Social Credit party. In fact, as Stengel points out, Manning was uncomfortable with its anti-Semitic faction. Facing an election, and stung by charges of Nazism by Alberta's CCF leader, Manning decided to wipe the slate clean.

In a radio broadcast on March 2, 1944, he repudiated anti-Semitism. Citing Social Credit's Jew-baiters and the anti-Semitism of Today and Tomorrow, Rosenberg countered that Manning's repudiation rang hollow.

Louis Rosenberg

Social Credit's national president, Solon Low, proved Rosenberg right. In a speech in 1945, Low denied that Social Credit was anti-Semitic. But in the next breath, he said that anti-Semitism was growing because Jews occupied a disproportionate number of positions in international finance and in revolutionary politics. The perception that Social Credit was anti-Semitic was further heightened by its members' insinuations that the Holocaust was a fabrication and that Jewish refugees were in the vanguard of an attempted Communist revolution in Canada.

In 1947, Rosenberg released a content analysis of one of its publications, Canadian Social Crediter. The study showed that 42 out of 106 issues from 1945 to 1947 had carried anti-Semitic articles.

Reacting to the mounting criticism of Social Credit's anti-Semitism, Manning replaced the editor of Canadian Social Crediter and decreed that writers advocating such beliefs would henceforth be banned from its pages. Unimpressed by the changes, Rosenberg charged that Manning was not much different than Low or Jaques. It was probably an unfair charge, since most Congress officers agreed that Social Credit had conducted a housecleaning and that anti-Semitism was now peripheral to the movement.

Yet Manning's purge was resisted by three Social Credit factions: the Union des Electeurs in Quebec, the Union of Electors in Ontario and the Douglas Social Credit Council in Alberta. These groups declared that Manning had become a Zionist and that the party was being run by communists, socialists, Freemason, Jews and Congress.

Traces of anti-Semitism remained in the official party following the purge, and Rosenberg insisted that he could detect no difference between "kosher" and "non-kosher" Social Crediters. But in Stengel's estimation, the anti-Semites were indeed marginalized. Social Credit had concluded that open anti-Semitism was no longer acceptable in Canadian society. By 1949, the year Jaques died, Congress was able to relax its vigil of the Social Credit party, which had succeeded in changing its image.

Redefining American Jewry

Jew vs. Jew The Struggle For The Soul of American Jewry*, by: Samuel G. Freedman, Random House, $38.00

Books

Bernard Baskin

North America Jews are fighting among themselves as never before over questions of identity and authenticity. In recent decades, grievous problems have surfaced in the community caused or exacerbated by the growing power of haredi Judaism.

The author of this absorbing and well-researched book writes: "The Orthodox renaissance stands as the most striking and unexpected phenomenon in modern American Jewish history. With less than 10 percent of the Jewish population the Orthodox disproportionately affect the larger community, Orthodox hands hold the levers of halachic power on conversion standards and women's participation in worship."

It appears that a growing number of Jews look to the Orthodox for acceptance, approval and legitimacy.

Haredi Jews differ sharply from the modern Orthodox form of observance and philosophy. They disdain secular education, refuse co-operation with other forms of Judaism and renounce Zionism as blasphemy.

Described in this book are six areas of combustible conflict. One of these concerns a California congregation that almost fell apart after three years of controversy over whether to include the names of the matriarchs – Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah – along with those of the patriarchs in the Amidah prayer.

Actually, the question of religious equality for women will not go away; it is the source of considerable divisiveness and acrimony in many modern Orthodox and Conservative congregations.

In Beachwood, Ohio, (a suburb of Cleveland), Orthodox and non-Orthodox Jews battled unremittingly in the courts and community over plans by the Orthodox to erect a complex of synagogues and a day school. Less observant residents feared that their town would be regarded as an insular Jewish ghetto.

In Jacksonville, Fla., in 1997, an emotionally troubled follower of Rabbi Meir Kahane and the Jewish Defence League planted a "dummy" bomb in a synagogue where 1,500 people had gathered to hear a lecture by Shimon Peres. Harry Shapiro, who planted the device, hated Peres for his dovish attitude toward the Palestinians. Apprehended, Shapiro was sentenced to 10 years in federal prison.

In Denver, Colo., for a six-year period starting in 1977, Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis established a unique approach to conversion – a creative and practical approach to a vexatious problem.

In 1983, however, under pressure from a national Orthodox group the Orthodox rabbis withdrew from the program. A local rabbi stated, "The lesson that we learn from this experience is that it's erroneous to build the idea of Jewish unity on religious or ideological compromise."

Freedman concludes that secular or ethnic Judaism with its emphasis on attachment to Israel, membership in Jewish institutions, concern for social justice etc., is eventually doomed to failure. He is confident that "except for religion, Jews had little to hold onto that made them feel like Jews."

The author predicts that North American Jewry will, in time, reorganize into factions that he terms haredi, Conservadox, Reformative and Just Jews. Groups two and three in this configuration will move closer together as they seek a common core of traditional belief and practice.

This is an intelligent, even-handed, honest portrait of North American Jews in ferment. It is hard to put down and shouldn't be missed.

Kiddush and chillul HaShem

Guest Voice

"Do not desecrate My holy name but let Me be sanctified amongst the children of Israel, I am God who hallows you, who brings you out of Egypt to be your Lord, I am God" (Leviticus 22:32-33). The Torah tells us that the purpose of redemption from Egypt was so that we, the Jewish people, would devote our lives to the concept of kiddush HaShem, and avoid at all possible costs the desecration of God's name. The Egyptian exile was necessary in order for us to develop sensitivity towards others. "Do not wrong a stranger and do not oppress him for you were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Shemot, 22:20).

In fact, the juxtaposition of remembering the exodus and treating all people with dignity appears over 30 times in the Bible, more so than any other mitzvah in the Torah. Any action that causes people to equate Judaism with honesty, integrity and morality is an act of sanctification of the name. Our talmudic sages tell us that the way to cause the name of God to be loved is to "speak kindly to our fellow man and be honest and honorable in our business dealings" (Yoma 86a). Actions such as returning excess change, giving up a seat for an elderly person, giving a large tip, and thanking the mailman for delivering the mail are applications of this mitzvah.

While we must strive to lead a life that is the embodiment of kiddush HaShem, we must be ready to pay the ultimate price in order to sanctify the name of God. Throughout much of our history, Jews were often forced to sanctify God's name by forfeiting their lives rather than abandon Judaism and adopt another religion. Judaism teaches that anybody who is killed solely because he is Jewish sanctifies the name of God in death. Those who perished in the Holocaust and those who have died defending the state of Israel have fulfilled the ultimate mitzvah.

Kiddush HaShem is not only fulfilled on a personal level but must be implemented on a communal and national scale as well. Do we work towards improving the lot of others or are we bogged down in petty squabbles? Do other groups look to us as a model to be emulated? Do the nations of the world proclaim, "This great nation is certainly a wise and understanding people... they have such righteous rules and laws" (Devarim 6:6-8)? Our nationhood itself serves as a kiddush HaShem. The prophet Yechezkel (Chapter 36) tells us that the return of Israel to Zion will not be because of our merits but rather to end the desecration of God's name that our dispersion caused, to prevent the nations from taunting us as they claim our God is ineffectual.

The severity of causing a chillul HaShem can be seen from the fact that it is the only transgression for which "repentance cannot avert the decree of punishment, neither can Yom Kippur bring atonement, neither can suffering purify, until death will purify" (according to our sages). Our rabbis also teach us that "unintentional or intentional both are alike regarding desecration of the Name." For some sins no excuses will do. Jews are expected to act in a manner that brings honour to Jews, Judaism and God. When these expectations have not been met we have diminished God's name. And the greater the person, the more the person is seen to represent Judaism and the greater the expectations upon him. The Talmud (Yoma 86a) gives an example of chillul HaShem as "one who studies Torah who is not distinguished for his kindly ways with his fellow man and his honorable and honest dealings." Ritual observance without ethical behavior can be a dangerous mix.

A further aspect of the sanctification of God's name relates specifically to the non-Jewish world. Due to the increased potential for misunderstanding when dealing with those outside our faith group, we must be extra careful to ensure that non-Jews will perceive our actions in a most positive light. Therefore, such an obvious wrong as stealing is an even greater chillul HaShem when committed against a non-Jew. We, who are blessed to live in countries that have offered Jews unlimited and unprecedented freedoms, must ensure our behaviour towards our neighbours will truly reflect our role as "a light unto the nations."

Maimonides places the laws of sanctification of God's name as part of the Hilchot Yesodei HaTorah (the basis of Torah), the first section of his legal code, which discusses our obligation to believe in God, to love Him and to fear Him. By acting in a manner that brings glory to the name we affirm our belief in and our love of God.

Jewish stations worldwide

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, I conclude my look at Israeli radio on the Internet and also listen to Jewish stations from around the world and some stations that you can only hear on the Internet.

The Jerusalem Post creates regular "radio" broadcasts for Internet listeners only [http://www.jpostradio.com/]. The site presents an impressive mix of the latest news in English combined with features like an interview about the latest individual recognized as Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem, Sportswatch, music and Rabbi Berel Wein on the weekly parshah. You can also find a link to Jerusalem Post Radio right on The Canadian Jewish News' homepage [http://www.cjnews.com/].

Eretz magazine, the glossy geographic magazine from Israel, sponsors an interesting mix of English-language programs daily [http://www.broadcastnewsworks.com/]. You can hear a two-minute review of the day's headlines, business highlights and in interesting feature called Israel is Great, But…

Newsfromisrael.com [http://www.newsfromisrael.com/] seems to be presented by the same people who produce Arutz 7 [http://www.a7.org]. A short English-language newscast is constantly rebroadcast and periodically updated.

Coverage of the Jewish world continues on the Internet outside of Israel. WFMU in New York broadcasts Jewish-related content for 15 hours weekly [http://www.jmintheam.org]. You can listen live to their shows or you can choose from their massive archives of music and interviews.

From Cleveland, Ohio, to the World via the Internet you can tune in to Phil Fink's Shalom America, which calls itself North America's favourite Jewish radio program [http://shalom-am.com]. On the day I tuned in, the schedule consisted of Phil Fink's Shalom America show, followed by Cantorial Music, The Chameleon Hour (Israeli rock with Baruch Friedland), Classical Works by Jewish Composers and Kosher Cooking With Myra Chanin. I found the quality of the signal good, but there was an annoying choppiness causing drop-offs in the music.

Click onto The Yiddish Voice, from WUNR in Brookline, Mass., [http://www.yiddishvoice.com/] and you'll be greeted by the friendly voice of Chasia Segal over the theme song, Lomir ale in eynem. Even if you're not listening to their live broadcast Wednesdays at 7:30 p.m. eastern time, there's plenty to hear right on the Web site: interviews, music – and even a rare recording of Sholom Aleichem reading from his story If I Were Rothschild (a rich man).

If you like music, try out Nusach, a Web-only radio station hosted by Winston Weilheimer [http://sites.netscape.net/nusachmaven/nusach24hours]. Along with his children-oriented Shalom Yiladim, Weilheimer provides Jewish music 24 hours a day. I had some difficulty connecting, but once in, I quite enjoyed the service.

And we'll conclude in France with a really surprising find. Radio Kol Hachalom (The Voice of Peace) is based in Grenoble and has been broadcasting since 1983 [http://www.rkhfm.com/info2.html]. On its English-language Web page, it defines its mission as defending Judaism and Israel against "the misinformation or the undeniable bias" of much of the Western media. The station was established mostly by volunteers for the community of 7,000 Jews, but since it began Webcasting last year, it has a much larger potential audience. You will need the free Quicktime plug-in to listen to this service [http://www.apple.com/quicktime/download/]. I found the sound quality excellent. Programming is in French and Hebrew, and aside from news and live interviews, offers quite a range of music you might not hear elsewhere, from contemporary Israeli to French dance to Sephardi rap.

With events changing every day in the Middle East, it's hard to keep up with the latest developments. The Jerusalem Post has created a marvelous page with links to all the major Israeli media, Israeli political parties and government institutions and lobbying groups. [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Sites/] And if you want to see how the conflict is being reported in the Arabic press, there are also links to major media within the West Bank and throughout the Middle East.

The kindness of Abraham

By RABBI DAVID GINSBERG

Chesed, Hebrew for kindness, has always been a primary value of the Jewish people.

The Chovos Halavavos, the classic medieval work on ethics, points out a critical difference between chesed, on the one hand, and rachmanut or mercy, on the other. Penetrating to the core of our psyche, the author comments that if we respond only when we see the suffering of another, then it cannot be said that we are motivated by the selfless concern of chesed. Rather, since the knowledge of another's pain is the trigger for our action, we must assume that the act of kindness is to assuage our own feelings of discomfort. This is known as mercy.

The trait of mercy, rachmanut, is praiseworthy, but as Jews, we are striving for something more – for chesed. True chesed is not reaction, but proaction. The Jew who embodies this quality extends himself or herself constantly to the limits, to the end of his or her resources, to the entirety of his or her sphere of influence, before seeing the pain of another.

Avraham avinu, Abraham our forefather, is the archetype of this quality. We look to him for inspiration from his example. In last week's parshah, Vayeira, we found the fundamental textbook of chesed.

The portion opens with the story of three travellers who come to Avraham on a supernaturally hot day. (If you've been in Israel during a Middle Eastern heat wave, you know what I'm talking about). This also was the third day after he gave himself a circumcision at the age of 99. The quality of chesed that Abraham personified helped him muster from within the strength to wait in the heat to feed and serve needy travellers.

God performed his own kindness with Avraham. Because he saw Avraham's earnest desire to do chesed, He sent three travellers, angels, in the guise of nomads. Avraham then, despite his weakened condition, prepared most of the meal for them himself and served them as well.

To bring this up to date: Imagine standing outside your house on the coldest day of the Canadian winter, waiting for hours, because someone might come down the street and need a cup of hot chocolate. Brrrr! Did I forget to mention that in our imaginary scenario you have the flu?

This analogy takes the meaning of proactive to a new level and teaches us the Jewish concept of chesed.

Extending Jewish Life Lines

A new round of UJA FEDERATION continuity grants is helping to bring members of the community closer to Jewish life – a commitment of the current UJA FEDERATION Campaign For Our Children.

UJA FEDERATION recently awarded $75,000 to 18 organizations for a wide range of creative initiatives.

"These projects are intended to touch all segments of Jewish Toronto," explained Continuity Chair Glennie Lindenberg. "Many of this year's recipients are undertaking Jewish programming for our young people. In this way, they're establishing Jewish roots to take hold for a firm Jewish future. With UJA FEDERATION's annual campaign focusing on children, the significance of these grants takes on an added dimension."

Campaign 2001 – The Campaign For Our Children intends to raise $45 million – four million more than last year – with all additional donations directed to programs that assist children.

Here are highlights of the projects that recently received funding.

Jewish Renaissance in West T.O.

A group of families in Toronto's west end is determined to rebuild a Jewish community in the area, and with the help of UJA FEDERATION, they're on their way.

Forming the West Toronto Jewish Community Association, more than 15 Jewish families have come together to create participatory programming and increased Jewish interaction in west end neighbourhoods, including Parkdale, High Park, Bloor-West Village and Etobicoke.

"West Toronto once had a large and thriving Jewish population, but many moved away to other parts of the city," says Francine Dick, the Association's Coordinator. "The Association has created a new social dynamic, and a real sense of belonging, both for the parents and their children. This has given these families a stronger sense of identity, and allowed them to feel more comfortable with their Judaism."

Dick says that UJA FEDERATION continuity funding will help expand the Sunday school program for children, which helps them learn Hebrew and Judaism, including prayers, holidays traditions, and religious practices.

Reform Focuses on Campus

A new initiative, assisted by UJA FEDERATION funding, is underway to reach out to Reform Jewish students in post-secondary institutes across Greater Toronto.

Kesher-Reform on Campus will provide Jewish students from the Reform movement with programming throughout the school year, both on campus and in Reform temples.

Programs include "lunch and learns," providing students with lively lunchtime discussion on important Jewish issues, and Shabbat dinners.

"Our first Shabbat dinner was very successful, and has given us a lot of momentum to carry over into the new year," says Steven Greenwood, Co-Chair of the Kesher-Reform on Campus Committee. "We want to show Reform Jewish students that there are opportunities for involvement at their comfort level, which will allow them to maintain or increase their understanding of Judaism."

Minsker Seeks Sunday "Buzz"

Rabbi Shmuel Spero wants to inject new excitement in - and around – the Anshei Minsk Synagogue (www.theminsk.com), popularly known as the Minsker Congregation. The shul, dating back to the 1920s, will now open its doors on Sundays with regular drop-in programs for Toronto's downtown Jewish community.

UJA FEDERATION funding awarded for the Sunday "drop-in centre" will contribute, in part, toward covering the costs of creating the additional programming in the Minsker's basement facilities. Spero says the additions will help the synagogue, with its prime location and rich history, to attract more participants.

Rabbi Shmuel Spero (second from left) joins in an arts and crafts activity at the Anshei Minsk downtown drop-in.

"We have an eclectic congregation here, and a golden opportunity to create a buzz of activity on Sundays for what would otherwise be a quiet afternoon for this synagogue," Spero says. "There is incredible traffic in front of the shul. Anshei Minsk has excitement around it as part of the tourist attraction that is the Kensington Market."

Spero believes the synagogue will now be better able to showcase the history of the downtown Jewish community. "This will allow us to truly tie all the generations back to their origins," he says.

Programming for the Sunday drop-in will include entertaining educational activities for children, such as Jewish theme puppet shows, arts and crafts and a taste of market life. For young adults, "causal Sunday" classes will allow Jewish discussion on a variety of topics over refreshments, and will enhance participation in existing weekday programs.

Go Phish

For reasons about which music experts are uncertain, the rock group Phish attracts a huge Jewish following. And an organization called Gefiltefish is finding its way to the group's rock concerts so it can bring all those Jewish Phish fans closer to Jewish life. A UJA FEDERATION continuity grant is helping Gefiltefish to defray its travel costs.

"Phish may very well have the biggest following of young Jewish adults of any group in the world, and more Jewish 'phans' show up for the Toronto concert than anywhere else," says Gefiltefish Co-founder Victor Hyman. "Many of these 18-to-25-year-old fans are Jewish, as are their friends, but that's as far as it goes for them. We want to bridge that gap of knowledge, and get them to think about who they are [as Jews]. The UJA FEDERATION's grant has allowed us to continue extending our outreach."

Founded by Hyman and Rabbi Shmuel Skaist, from Jerusalem, Gefiltefish started to trail Phish on its North American tour in the summer of 1999. The outreach organization's Winnebago is now a mainstay at Phish concerts and tour "tail gate" parties in parking lots, and have become part of a culture rivaling the Grateful Dead's fan-inspired activities.

"Sometimes," says Hyman, "the outreach can range from something as small as helping one girl find out about kosher Pez, to having one-on-one discussions about the depth of Torah and Talmud."

A First for Russian Community

UJA FEDERATION and one of its beneficiary agencies, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, is helping the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) to establish its first Russian speaking branch.

Jack Kugelmass, Executive Director of JIAS, says the new division, made possible by a UJA FEDERATION continuity grant, will help NCJW to more effectively reach out to waves of Russian Jewish immigrants who have already settled in Toronto and those who are currently coming.

He says the branch will organize outreach events for Russian Jewish women to make information on NCJW's education and social action programs readily available. "This undertaking will also allow NCJW to produce literature about its programs and services in Russian," he adds.

Another benefit, Kugelmass says, will be to promote family involvement in Toronto's larger Jewish community and the need for increased philanthropy.

Building Hebrew Basics

The Sephardic Kehila Centre is launching a Hebrew night program this coming January for bar/bat mitzvah boys and girls, thanks to a UJA FEDERATION continuity grant.

Focusing on children ages nine to 13 preparing for their bar/bat mitzvah, the six-month program of weekly lessons will teach them the basics of reading, writing, and speaking Hebrew, complemented by High Holiday studies. A shabbaton component is also planned, pairing the learning of shabbat traditions with theme discussions on the bar/bat mitzvah experience.

"Offering this education in a night program allows children from public schools to gain the proper background in a fun, relaxed manner, while maximizing opportunities for family participation," says Salomon Beldeb, program Director for the Thornhill-based centre.

Adult education courses on the bar/bat mitzvah process will be taking place at the same time, allowing parents and grandparents to participate as well. Also welcome will be young Jewish adults who have never experienced a bar or bat mitzvah.

Continuity grants enable children to take first steps on the road to Jewish education.

Abuse of women affects entire family, says JF&CS panel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The abuse of women is not just a women's issue, says the supervisor of the women's abuse program at Jewish Family & Child Service.

"Violence affects the family unit. If it is affected by violence and pain, what can we expect from the next generation?" asked Debby Feldman at a recent panel discussion which launched Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's Women for Women campaign.

The other member of the panel, moderated by Rona Maynard, editor of Chatelaine magazine, was Karen (not her real name), a survivor of wife abuse.

Abuse, which includes sexual, emotional, verbal and psychological abuse, occurs when one person repeatedly attacks or intimidates another in order to gain control, said Feldman.

"There is usually a cycle which begins when the abuser experiences a build-up of tension, goes on to assault his wife, and then goes through a calm or [what we call] a honeymoon period. Unless the violence is interrupted, the abuse gets worse," she said.

Jewish families are not immune to abuse and at least 350 women currently being serviced by JF&CS have been self-identified as being abused, said Feldman.

"[In the general population], three million women in the United States and one million in Canada are affected by wife abuse, and 30 percent of women admitted to the hospital are victims of abuse."

Too often, she said, she is asked about the typical abused woman. "She is not of a particular age, religion or economic standing. Our experience tells us that women who [stay in abusive relationships] are not crazy or masochistic."

The reasons why women do not leave their abusive partner are complex, she said. "Some women find it difficult to extricate the mixed message of violence and love. Others are afraid they will lose their identity if they are alone, some have no money of their own and some fear it is too dangerous to leave their husbands."

Jewish women feel that by going public with their problem, they are letting down the Jewish community, said Feldman. "The sense of shalom bayit can work against women. Many Jewish women feel a heavy responsibility for keeping the family together and believe it is their duty to keep peace at home."

Women with high economic status find it difficult to leave, she said, because the community can be judgmental. "It is harder for those who have standing in the community to reveal that there is violence in their home."

JF&CS offers services for abused women, which include individual and group counselling, emergency financial assistance, referrals to kosher short-term emergency housing and consultations with, and referrals to, other professionals.

The agency also runs anger management workshops, group counselling for abusive men, and individual as well as group counselling for children who witness abuse.

Statistics say that 53 percent of men who batter their wives witnessed abuse in their own home, said Feldman, "and I think that statistic is low."

Karen said that emotional abuse, is one of the most devastating forms of abuse. "It can scar someone for life. Women may be called names, blamed for everything that goes wrong and kept in the dark about finances.

"Often, young children learn to treat their mothers with the same disrespect. They become abusive, and in time, they may teach that behaviour to their own children," said Karen.

Education, she said, is the only way to open the eyes of the Jewish community. "We cannot bury our heads in the sand. [I acknowledge] JF&CS for being the light that got me through my tunnel."

Co-chairs of the Women for Women campaign, which raises money for WIZO projects in Israel, are Diane Spivak and Judy Zelikovitz.

Constitutional democracy comes with a price: Rae

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a constitutional democracy such as Canada, there will inevitably be a lot of tension, says former premier of Ontario Bob Rae.

"When we live in such a democracy the people rule, but they cannot always rule in the way they want," he said at the recent Alan Coatsworth Memorial Lecture, co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Young Maccabbees; Canadian Council of Christian and Jews; and Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto.

"Before the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it was understood that accused people had certain rights, but these rights were not written out.

"Since the patriation of the Constitution, [they] are set out clearly."

When someone is alleged to have committed a crime and the court says there was, for example, an inappropriate warrant for his arrest, the individual will be released from jail, said Rae.

"The guilt is overturned and the process starts over. The popular reaction is that the government is being soft on criminals – that the government cares more about the criminal than the ordinary citizen."

When that happens, he said, there is an uneasiness in the general population. "[People wonder] what it means for the safety and security of citizens. There is a concern that the balance has swung too far."

We can never get away from this tension, he said. "Our fundamental protection is because of the commitment to this notion of the rule of law."

Rae said that we should never forget that a fundamental feature of Hitler's regime was the obliteration of respect for the individual.

"It is the strict following of the law that provides the greatest protection of the liberties of an individual. This does not only mean liberties for us, but also for people with whom we disagree, and people with whom we are uncomfortable."

Having a referendum to decide if Quebec should separate from Canada, "is constitutional nonsense.

"Canada is a democracy, and if Quebecers want a referendum, nothing can stop them. We must not mistake this expression of opinion in one province, however, as being the final determinant of the quality of our constitutional democracy."

It is possible to have a referendum on some matters in which the government may not want to make a decision, such as a change in the liquor law, he said. "The people can decide on matters like that; it is a majority decision.

"Basic questions can be settled by a referendum, but when it is used to affect a fundamental human right that is already protected by the Constitution, [the country] is making a huge mistake."

[Stockwell Day] is so wrong to think that a referendum can be used to question the rights of women, said Rae. "No majority of opinion can affect the rights that are already in the Constitution. That is letting a lynch mob rule; it is very wrong in a country such as ours.

"Everyone who values their liberties should speak out against using a referendum to affect our rights. That is contrary to the concept of living under a democracy.

"They should say that they do not condone a referendum that would be used to determine the fundamental rights of the individual. To have a referendum on gay rights would be ridiculous."

The challenge we face, said Rae, is to recognize that the Constitution is a lesson in self-restraint. "We live in a country where there are provisions for the rule of law. We cannot put these things to a vote."

War crimes case drags on

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nazi collaborator Serge Kisluk will appear before an Immigration adjudicator on Feb. 23, 2001, 11 months after an Order-in-Council stripped the retired St. Catharines autoworker of his citizenship.

The hearing, which could determine whether Kisluk will be deported, will come almost 20 months after a Federal Court judge ruled that Kisluk obtained citizenship by fraud or misrepresentation. It is not clear that Kisluk will be deported immediately following the February hearing, as his lawyer may raise legal issues involving domicile that could launch a new wave of judgments and appeals.

In a downtown Toronto hearing room last week, adjudicator Catherine Simmie postponed Kisluk's hearing so that the onetime auxiliary policeman could obtain legal counsel. Simmie spoke on the telephone with a Toronto lawyer who is considering taking the case but had not yet been retained.

In June 1999, Federal Court Judge Allan Lutfy found that Kisluk served during the war as a railway guard and as a police officer in Makovichi, a small town just south of the city of Kovel, Ukraine. During his service as an auxiliary policeman, Kisluk and another armed officer took a 20-year-old Jewish woman to a wooded area where she was shot. Witnesses who testified in Ukraine said the woman had worked in the police headquarters knitting socks for the officers.

Kisluk was also personally involved in beating a Jew named Moshko Goldshmidt and might have shot him except for the intervention of neighbours, Lutfy's judgment states.

Kisluk denied any involvement in the incidents and contended his duties involved policing minor domestic disputes and apprehending chicken thieves. Lutfy rejected Kisluk's testimony as well as his contention that evidence against him was concocted by the KGB.

"Simply put, I do not believe the respondent's [Kisluk's] testimony on any contentious issue," the judge stated.

Kisluk repeated his claim that he was framed by the KGB, when he appeared briefly before Simmie on Oct. 6.

"I don't deserve to be deported because I've done nothing wrong," he said.

Emunah's new face benefits JF&CS

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Emunah Women of Toronto, part of an international, religious Zionist movement, has a new face.

"We feel we have to be modern – to be 2000," said project co-ordinator Laurie Teperman and co-president Aryella Weisz.

"The Torah doesn't change, [but] the environment changes," Teperman said.

The first step was to go beyond Emunah's traditional commitment to fundraising for Israeli causes only, and reach out to Toronto's Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS).

"We decided we needed to support a Toronto organization too," said Teperman. "We chose JF&CS because it is Jewish, and it is concerned about issues surrounding children and women – just like Emunah is."

Besides, Weisz added, the organization is "receptive to letting us direct our fundraising to a specific cause. We wanted it to go to foster care."

The first large event will be a black tie evening on Dec. 14 at the Park Hyatt Hotel at Bloor Street and Avenue Road. A portion of the net proceeds will go to JF&CS.

The evening will include sushi, flower and patisserie demonstrations; a five course dinner; a live and a silent auction; and entertainment by The Evansons, an award-winning group of illusionists.

Emunah also plans to do some joint programming with JF&CS, Teperman said.

The hope is that the new direction being taken will become a prototype for Emunah Women of Canada, she said. "If we do well, other cities will likely do it too."

Rather than concentrating on one-of-a-kind fund-raising events, the organization wants to undertake ongoing projects. One that Teperman and Weisz are very excited about is the Jewish Travellers' Guide to the City of Toronto, which is expected to come out in the near future.

It will feature a map of the areas of the GTA that have the largest concentration of Jewish residents, and a list of such amenities as kosher restaurants, synagogues and book and gift stores.

Weisz said the guide will be placed in hotels, bookstores – "anywhere that tourists will be found."

Teperman and Weisz stressed that Emunah is still dedicated to its projects in Israel, which include nurseries, day cares, schools and, most recently, a crisis centre in their residential centre at Neve Michael in Pardes Chanah, the only non-profit organization requested and designated by the Israeli welfare department to provide crisis services for children at immediate risk.

For more information about Emunah, its projects, or the dinner, call the office, 416-636-0036.

Torontonian honoured for aiding disabled

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Morris (Mickey) Milner never met Terry Fox, there's a good chance the Canadian hero used a prosthetic leg that Milner was involved in designing.

This week Milner, the director of the rehabilitation engineering and research departments and vice-president of research at the Bloorview MacMillan Centre, is one of four Canadians being inducted into the Terry Fox Hall of Fame for his ongoing work helping people with disabilities.

The annual award was created in 1994 by the Canadian Foundation for Physically Disabled Persons to honour physically disabled adults providing inspiration and hope, and others who've worked for Canadians with physical disabilities.

Fox's 1980 Marathon of Hope inspired young scientists to improve the technology that helps amputees, said Milner, 64, at his Bloorview office last week. "One was really enormously touched by what he was able to do, and the circumstances."

If Fox were still alive, he would benefit from a lighter weight prosthesis with more flexibility at the knee joint, he noted.

Among the newest advances is surgery done in Sweden to screw the artificial limb into the bone, said Milner. He thinks that type of solution as routine is decades away.

An electrical engineer who taught at Witwatersrand University in his native Johannesburg, where he received his PhD, Milner became interested in biomedical engineering because of his oldest child, who had cerebral palsy and died at the age of three. Milner and his wife Maureen, an artist, have two grown children and one grandchild.

His work has been recognized by a listing in Canadian Who's Who and almost two dozen awards and honours are listed on his curriculum vitae. Among his other affiliations, he is a professor at the University of Toronto.

Milner's latest award honours his whole team, not just himself, he said. "I'm surrounded by an incredible array of talent."

He got his start in the working world helping his father, a Lithuanian immigrant, in his grocery store.

"I have an incredible admiration for my father," Milner said. "He came without the language, and learned English and Afrikaans. He started off selling bottles and bags."

Although most of Milner's time these days is devoted to administration, much of his work at Bloorview related to electric hand development.

Among the specialized prostheses developed there are a hand that can hold a hockey stick and release it quickly and a "ball catcher" designed to withstand substantial force.

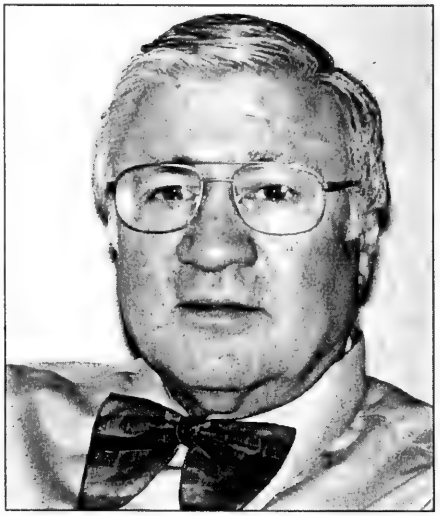
"When we have graduate students, their social conscience is aroused enormously," said Milner, who finds his work "very satisfying.

"It's going to have an immediate impact on somebody. It's not like building a bridge [where] you don't see the impact immediately."

A contact at Bloorview led to his involvement with Jewish Vocational Services, which has programs dealing with rehabilitation. He became JVS president at their annual meeting this year.

Milner has spent most of the past 30 years in this country, beginning with a 1967 sabbatical in Ottawa and including a stint in Hamilton. He also spent a year as a senior research associate at Emory University in Atlanta. "We lost our hearts to Canada," he said.

Not only was the political situation better than South Africa's, but Milner found the change of seasons to be "very refreshing...it kind of gets you moving."



Morris (Mickey) Milner

He was also impressed by the freedom to speak one's mind and the availability of resources in his field. "From a professional point of view, I was just wowed. It was so stimulating. We just felt a sense of emancipation, freedom."

Concordia students asked to vote on anti-Israel resolution

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A proposed resolution in the name of all Concordia University students has seriously worsened an already tense situation between Jewish and Arab students.

The proposal calls, in part, for Canada to cut ties with Israel.

Jewish students claim they feel they are under siege from a bombardment of anti-Israel propaganda, and discriminated against by the students' association because of a perceived bias toward the Arab cause.

The discord has reached a point where Rector Frederick Lowy took the unusual step of directing all students to "maintain a climate of free speech, mutual respect and civil debate" or face consequences.

Lowy acknowledged that "acrimonious encounters" have occurred between the two sides, and some students report "feeling intimidated and uncomfortable."

"We respect and uphold free speech provided this occurs in a civil fashion. We also respect and uphold the right to peaceful assembly, provided this does not interfere with the rights of others to make use of campus facilities.

"However, we deplore and will not tolerate harassment, intimidation, threats or violence. Conduct that gives rise to any of these situations will be dealt with promptly, in accordance with Concordia's Code of Rights and Responsibilities."

A general assembly of students is expected to be held next week by the Concordia Student Union (CSU), the official representative of the university's undergraduates, to consider the resolution, which was brought forward by Solidarity with Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), a campus group that actively promotes the Palestinian cause.

The proposal reads: "Be it resolved that the CSU call on the Canadian government to put pressure on the Israeli government to implement the [UN] Resolution No. 242. This pressure should include cutting diplomatic and economic ties with the Israeli State."

All undergraduates are being urged by the CSU, which claims to be neutral, to attend the assembly and "make an informed decision."

A quorum of 526 is required to hold a vote. A simple majority of that number is enough to carry a motion on behalf of 25,000 students.

The vote was scheduled to take place Nov. 16, but was postponed the same day when the CSU's judicial board upheld a complaint lodged that notice of the general assembly was issued short of the required seven days.

Resolution 242, passed in 1967, became a cornerstone of the peacemaking process in the Arab-Israeli conflict, but has been contentious because of the Arab interpretation that it demands Israel's withdrawal from all the territories and means a return of Palestinian refugees to what is now Israel.

Hillel, the official Jewish organization, takes the position that Jewish students should boycott the assembly and not mount any campaign for the "no."

The SPHR, meanwhile, has been conducting an aggressive campaign, plastering the walls with anti-Israel posters.

Hillel is still stinging from a rebuke it received from the CSU. Its council of representatives censured Hillel for distributing a pamphlet that contained an opinion piece calling Palestine a "never never land" and allegedly denied the existence of Palestinian culture. The council described it as "discriminatory" and "offensive."

Hillel removed the material, and initially spoke of withdrawing from the CSU, but is now backtracking. Such a move would mean the loss of funding and office space.

"Jewish students feel threatened by the atmosphere on campus," said Joshua Margo, Concordia Hillel president. "People are fearful coming to school. They don't want to wear a kippah."

Hillel is boycotting the general assembly because it does not want to "give credence" to the whole exercise, he said. He believes the CSU has no business adopting foreign policy on behalf of all students, and he cannot recall a general assembly ever being held before to discuss an international matter.

"The CSU should be inclusive of all members. Our No. 1 priority now is to help Jewish students not feel ostracized, and that's what happens when decisions are made on foreign policy," said Hillel vice-president Maya Haasz.

CSU president Rob Green said the association's bylaws require that a general assembly be held on "any issue, no matter how contentious, political or irrelevant, if more than 100 students sign a petition" calling for one. (In this case about 140 signatures were submitted.)

The CSU executive does not take a position in support of either side during the time leading up to a general assembly, he said, and the CSU offers equal resources to the "yes" and the "no." Green said the CSU logo is mandatory on all posters to indicate authorization, but does not indicate endorsement.

Green said the CSU has a history of taking positions on international and political matters, such as apartheid, repression in East Timor and globalization.

The university has attempted to encourage moderation and has worked with the student groups "to encourage restraint, a positive dialogue and a lessening of potentially confrontational approaches," Lowy said.

The Jewish students have the support of B'nai Brith (BB) and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

BB accused the CSU of "fomenting anti-Israel student sentiment." It alleges that calling for a general assembly to vote on an anti-Israel resolution amounts to "a summons to hundreds of Arab students to allegedly speak on behalf of all Concordia students."

BB official Stephen Scheinberg, chair of Concordia's history department, said the CSU should have tried to bring Arab and Jewish students together to reduce tensions, such as through a teach-in to debate the issues.

CJC said the proposed resolution and censure of Hillel is "a one-sided attack on Israel and an attempt to undermine Jewish students on campus."

Ottawa Jewish community pays tribute to Rabin

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – The late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was honoured recently by members of the Jewish community on the fifth anniversary of his death.

In a moving tribute organized by the Israeli Embassy, Rabin's life story was traced through music, slides and narrative.

"Today, more than ever, we miss his leadership, his vision, inspiration and wisdom," said Israeli ambassador Haim Divon.

Divon urged those present to remember Rabin's legacy of peace, in spite of the recent violence in Israel.

"He sacrificed his life in the battle for peace, perhaps his most difficult battle, and the battle goes on," he said.

Rabbi Arnold Fine had met Rabin in the United States and remembered him as "shy and reticent."

'He taught, and still teaches, many lessons'

Even in death, Rabbi Fine said, Rabin's courage and strength live on in those who follow in his footsteps. "He taught, and still teaches, many lessons," he said.

The Shira Ottawa Choir, under the direction of Cantor Daniel Benlolo, performed several selections, including Shir Lashalom, the song which Rabin was singing at the peace rally just seconds before he was murdered.

Students from Yitzhak Rabin High School participated in the memorial ceremony, reading poetry in both English and Hebrew. Statements from Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Minister of Foreign Affairs John Manley, were read as well.

Although Manley was out of town, John McNee, director general of the Middle East and North Africa division, department of foreign affairs, and Michael Grant, desk officer for Israel, attended the ceremony.

McNee had served in Israel while Rabin was alive.

"His enormous achievements meant so much to the country and his death was such an enormous tragedy for Israel and the region and for prospects of peace," said McNee, "so it is an important anniversary for us, as well."

Given the current situation in Israel, Divon reminded the audience that "for Israel, there is no path that is without pain, but the path of peace is better than the path of war."

What should have been learned

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

If our children acted in the way the five party leaders did during their recent debates and on the hustings across the country, we would be girding our loins to embark upon a serious regimen of discipline. Polls indicate that of the few Canadians who actually endured the full debate ordeal, the single most-cited reaction was "disappointment."

However, before slipping too quickly into self-satisfied complacency regarding the politicians' public behaviour, it is appropriate to think about the three key lessons that the Jewish community should have learned from this campaign.

The first lesson is: never let your issue become a political football during an election campaign. Generally speaking, it is a losing proposition – even if you do win in the short term. The community's mishandling of the Israel-bashing UN fiasco is proof. Despite a positive meeting with the prime minister, antagonism from within the Jewish community to the Liberals continued. The consequences were resentful friends within the Liberal caucus and an exercised Arab community that demanded (and received) equal access to the prime minister.

The second lesson is: never rely on an election campaign to get your message out. Kim Campbell got it right when she suggested that an election campaign is not the time to engage in serious discussion about policy issues. Even though her party was obliterated in the election that ensued, the message was an important one. Interest groups like the Jewish community must promote their agenda in a sustained and systematic way between elections. That way, they can be certain that the essential aspects of the issues are understood and, hopefully, endorsed by the political decision-makers. This approach obviates the need for having to manage a crisis as in Lesson #1 above. In a nutshell, good politics is all about developing relationships.

The third lesson is really the key lesson and it brings us back to the issue of discipline.

The Jewish community will only be a successful participant in the political arena if is exercises a consistent level of inner discipline. It cannot send mixed messages. It cannot have its leadership – or an element of its leadership – advocating a certain position and its grassroots constituency advocating a contrary view. It has to have a reputation of playing by the rules and meriting the trust of those it seeks to influence.

Now go out and vote for the best candidate!

Reform Judaism sounds warning against child poverty

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Delegates to the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism's recent biennial convention marched on Parliament Hill to protest child poverty in Canada.

Although the march had been planned in advance, no member of Parliament met the protestors upon their arrival.

Highlights of the biennial included the opening night keynote address by 17-year old Craig Kielburger of Toronto, world-renowned children's rights advocate.

At the age of 12, having read about the murder of a young child labourer in Pakistan, Kielburger rallied a group of friends and founded the organization Free the Children, now the world's largest network of children helping children with over 100,000 young people in 27 countries.

Speaking without notes, Kielburger told tales of his travels and adventures around the world over the past five years.

"The world has more than enough," he said, "it's a question of whether or not we want to share."

Ten years ago, the Canadian government pledged to eliminate child poverty in Canada by the year 2000. "Why is it, that when a parent neglects to take care of a child, we call that child abuse, but when the federal and provincial governments across the country neglect to take care of children we call it balancing the budget?" he asked.

Kielburger urged delegates to "carry back a message to the young people, a message of hope, that we live our faith every day, not only through prayer but through action.

"The challenge is to go back to young people and to help them realize that they have the power to bring about change."

The biennial, attended by about 200 delegates was the culmination of Project 2000, the fight against child poverty.

Nancy Bercovitch, president of CCRJ, was elected to serve a second two-year term.

"We all know that we haven't won the war [against child poverty]," she said. "We are still fighting and hope to make a difference."

Throughout the weekend, workshops and plenary sessions were held, as well as Shabbat services and Torah study sessions.

One of the goals that came out of the meetings was to actively recruit young people to consider careers within the Reform movement. "There is a critical shortage of Reform rabbis, cantors and educators," said Bercovitch.

The next biennial will be held in Toronto.

INGREDIENTS OF A SUCCESSFUL SMEAR

Charges that attempt to link Day with Nazism are vicious

By Norman Doidge, reprinted from the National Post, Thursday, November 16, 2000.

On Tuesday (Nov. 14) Elinor Caplan, the Liberal government's Minister of Immigration, said of the Opposition party that "Their supporters are Holocaust deniers, prominent bigots and racists," and, referring to the Leader of the Opposition, said "You can tell who a person is by the people who support him." The clear implication is that Stockwell Day is a Holocaust denier and a racist.

This is the culmination of a whisper campaign that has been alleging Day is anti-Semitic and Nazi-friendly for weeks. The charges are being fueled by The Toronto Star, with columns by Dalton Camp, Michele Landsberg, Joey Slinger and others. Slinger wrote: "Imagine Heinrich Himmler is living in Canada. How do you think he'll vote? ... How about [Holocaust denier] Ernst Zundel?" Slinger then raised the example of James Keegstra, a Holocaust denier who used his high school classroom to preach his anti-Semitic message. Slinger wrote: "Today Keegstra runs a garage in Bentley, Alberta, where Day cut his political teeth. He used to service Day's car."

Are these justified fears, or unjustified smears? One way to sort it out is to think about what a smear is. A smear is an attempt to discredit an opponent without being obliged to prove the point. The smear artist soils with a dirty substance that's difficult to remove. The person who is smeared is placed in a quandary. Responding keeps the smear alive because there is a subtle guilt by association when a person says, "I am not a racist" -- at least in the minds of those who believe where there's smoke, there's fire. Yet not responding is taken as an admission of guilt.

All the following criteria, taken together -- and that's the key point -- demonstrate that Day is being smeared:

■ The timing. Stockwell Day was the only Canadian party leader to stand up against the Liberal government's vote for a recent, one-sided anti-Semitic United Nations resolution that blamed all the current difficulties in the Middle East on the Jewish state. It was one of 14 such one-sided, resolutions the Liberals supported this past year. Jews cheered Day for opposing it, and Liberals began losing Jewish votes in ridings such as Caplan's. It was time to make Jews think twice about Day. But how?

■ Inspire fear. Imagine invoking Heinrich Himmler, head of the Nazi Gestapo, a mass murderer who ran concentration camps, in connection with Stockwell Day? Mr. Day has never advocated any of these things. He has publicly opposed anti-Semitism. The reference to Himmler is obscenely gratuitous, the worst kind of demagoguery.

■ Guilt by association. A Day-Keegstra tie? There was only one garage in Bentley. Keegstra worked there. Day told me, "I had my car serviced there once. I used that to see if he had the views attributed to him. When it became clear he had personally antagonistic views toward Jews, I told him I didn't agree with his historical or personal position and left." Slinger twists this one-time confrontation into a relationship. How would you like to be held accountable for the political views of a man who serviced your car once?

■ Wrong facts. Another false charge, recycled by Caplan and Landsberg, is that Day ran a private Christian school that used the Accelerated Christian Education curriculum, which had portions that were insensitive to Jews and others. But an Alberta government education review, led by Jewish Senator Ron Ghitter, found no evidence whatsoever that offensive portions of the curriculum were used at the school when Day was there. Asked if he thought Day was an anti-Semite, the senator said, "I would never make that allegation against Stockwell."

■ Don't check with Jews who know Day. Milton Bogoch, for instance, is an Orthodox practising Jew, active in numerous Jewish organizations in Calgary, and founding director of The Calgary Homeless Foundation, who has written: "I keep hearing and reading ugly untruths about Stockwell Day's attitude to Jews ... In my 14 years' acquaintance with Stock, including campaigning for him door to door in the early years when he did not know me well or that I was Jewish, there never has been a whiff of anti-Semitism from him ... he is no more anti-Semitic than I am."

■ Ignore contrary evidence. Dalton Camp wrote that Zundel's lawyer Doug Christie "appears to have infiltrated the Reform Alliance party." In fact, Christie's membership had been revoked, minutes after the Alliance Council discovered Christie had signed up. (Extremists often try to get into major parties to legitimize themselves. Zundel campaigned for the Liberal leadership in 1968, dropping out last minute. Would Caplan argue one should never vote Liberal because Zundel supported the party?)

This is an issue of political morality. These charges, which attempt to link Day with Nazism in the public mind, are vicious. Day's accusers, claiming to be sensitive to Jews, seem more interested in frightening them, by attacking the one party leader who criticized a UN vote overwhelmingly one-sided against the Jewish state. Beyond smearing Day, these charges do the fight against anti-Semitism a disservice. For petty partisan purposes, they drain the charge of anti-Semitism of its seriousness, so that when real anti-Semites come along, the charge will seem frivolous. And that is what makes Ernst Zundel and Jim Keegstra truly happy.

With permission of the National Post and Norman Doidge

Dear Fellow Members of the Jewish Community:

I keep hearing and reading ugly untruths about The Alliance and Stockwell Day's attitude to Jews. I cannot tell you where they come from, but they are absolutely inaccurate.

In my 14 years acquaintance with Stock, including campaigning for him door to door in 1986 when he did not know me or know that I was Jewish, there never has been a whiff of anti-Semitism from him. He is a genuine human being who is truly concerned about the welfare of all of the people of Canada.

My friends in the Alliance and its leader are particularly respectful of my adherence to traditional Judaism. This causeless hatred (Sin'at chinam) of the Alliance and Stockwell Day is unwarranted. Many members of the western Jewish community are members of the Alliance. Please consider the Alliance as a legitimate party prepared to govern this country. Please consider Stockwell Day on his merits as a future Prime Minister of Canada, and give no more thought to libelous statements.

He is no more anti-Semitic than I am.

Sincerely, Milton Bogoch

About the writer. Mr. Bogoch is an active member of the Calgary Jewish Community. He is a member of B'nai Brith, co-Chair of the Jewish Community Telethon, Director of the Jewish Community Apartments; and a member of the house committee of the Calgary Jewish Centre. Mr. Bogoch is a Shomer Shabbat member of Congregation House of Jacob - Mitvah Israel, where he has served on the board as treasurer and trustee.

Dear Friends:

As a Holocaust survivor (when I was four, Eichmann did not have enough trains to take my mother and me from the Budapest ghetto to the concentration camps), I'll tell you what Elinor Caplan's and the Liberal party's guilt-by-association accusation of Holocaust denial against Day and the Canadian Alliance reminds me of: Goebels and the Nazi technique of the Big Lie.

It remains to be seen whether the Goebels technique of spreading lies about the Alliance party just before the elections will persuade enough Canadian voters to make their decision on the basis of unjustified emotional smears, or of more factual and rational considerations.

Vancouver candidates field questions on UN vote

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A standing room only crowd packed the Jewish Community Centre's Norman Rothstein Theatre last week for a question and answer session with local candidates.

At least 350 people turned out to listen to 14 candidates from four parties – Liberal, NDP, Progressive Conservative (PC) and Canadian Alliance – representing five Vancouver ridings.

Hosted jointly by the Pacific region of Canadian Jewish Congress, the Vancouver Multicultural Society and SUCCESS, an organization of Vancouver's Chinese community members, candidates were asked six questions about multiculturalism, immigration, human rights, social justice and Canada's responsibility in international affairs.

NDP calls for security, justice in the region

The lead-off question concerned Israel's right to a safe and secure existence within its borders in the Middle East. Candidates were asked if they supported Canada's recent UN voting record and how they would cast future ballots.

Alliance nominee Kerry-Lynne Findlay said Canada has deeply let down Israel. "We haven't helped them in going against them at the UN," she said.

Alliance nominee John Mortimer added that his party would not have supported Resolution 1322 or the past 19 UN votes that have been critical of Israel. "I don't believe Canada has been even-handed and I personally strongly oppose the Liberal position.

"Canada has to act as an honest broker in the peace process and it helps no one in that process to blame Israel and lay no blame on the other side," Mortimer said, prompting a large round of applause from the audience.

Liberal MP Hedy Fry objected to Mortimer's statement that her party voted 19 times against Israel in the UN, adding that a pillar of Canadian policy is the belief that Israel should have safe borders. Fry did not, however, elaborate upon her party's recent vote that outraged thousands of Canadian Jews.

NDP nominee Loretta Woodcock stated that it is essential for Canada to pursue security and justice in the region. "The problem for Canada right now is, where is our participation? Canada has become very weak in foreign affairs. We used to mediate. Look at the Oslo agreement – it was done in little Norway. We could have been involved in this."

However, Woodcock failed to truly answer the question put before her party, and did not mention whether the NDP supported Canada's recent condemnation of Israel.

PC nominee Michael Walsh had perhaps the most forthright response to the question. "It would be inappropriate for Canada to extend that unquestioning support to the actions of any government in Israel," he said.

"The Progressive Conservative party does indeed have a policy and a commitment to participate in the UN. I can tell you that if Joe Clark had been prime minister during this UN resolution, he would have fought for more balanced wording. However, even if the resolution had not been more balanced or better written, [it] still would have been supported by Canada."

A palpably awkward silence followed Walsh's declaration.

In an interview with the CJN following the candidates' forum, Zena Simces, CJC chair, said Walsh's answer came as a bit of a shock. "I think everyone was surprised by that," she said.

Health care major concern in Don Valley West

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Health care is a major concern for the majority of constituents in Don Valley West, says Liberal incumbent John Godfrey, 57, who has represented the riding since 1993.

Don Valley West is bounded on the north by Highway 401 and on the west by Yonge Street. It jogs across Broadway Avenue and down Bayview to take in Leaside and the Don Valley Parkway. It then moves east to Don Mills Road north of Wynford Drive. The southern boundary is the railway tracks at the south end of Leaside.

Of the 108,000 residents of the riding, 69,000 are voters, the majority of whom speak English.

John Godfrey

"Since the beginning of the campaign, people – especially older people – have expressed their concerns about health care," says Godfrey, who is now chair of the Liberal caucus social policy committee, and chair of the standing committee on children and youth at risk.

"I pointed out however, that the health-care deal the Liberal party structured with the provinces in September, provides for $21 billion in additional funding over the next five years.

"Some of this money is [earmarked] for medical equipment and some for information systems, so the temptation will not be there to increase the salaries of professionals," Godfrey says.

A total of $2.2 billion will go towards early childhood development, which "although not directly related to health, is a way of reducing future health care demands."

While Godfrey would like to see tax cuts and debt reduction, he also wants to see more money go towards health care, the environment, education and affordable housing. "I like the 50-50 formula, with 50 percent going towards debt reduction. The economy will prosper when the debt is reduced."

The logical answer to the question of separate school funding is to fund "all or none. I am, however, in favour of the public school system.

"A historical deal was made at Confederation in which it was agreed to have two school systems and two languages. It is possible to argue that the price we paid to get Confederation, was to have to put up with this anomaly."

He is not in favour of a tax break for people who send their children to private schools.

"It is not the role of the federal government to support private schools. That would undermine public education by encouraging people to leave the public system. I believe in the unity of society."

He was concerned about Canada's support for UN Resolution 1322, but says that there is now a "better line of communication into the prime minister's office.

"It is very important to be perceived on all sides as being even-handed. We cannot be perceived to be having bias one way or the other."

In general, he says, he does not see a trend towards the right in his riding. "There will be some who are right-to-life and in favour of gun control, and others who are angry about certain issues, and they will probably vote Alliance or Conservative. I do not, however, see an upsurge of angry people."

John Wakelin

Michael Murton, 47, the Progressive Conservative candidate, says people in his riding are looking for change. "They are concerned about such an early election, and they have huge concerns about health care – limited equipment and long waits – because they believe there is a crisis in the system."

Social programs are the core of the community, says Murton, and "we have to provide an opportunity for all citizens so they can move forward.

"My worry, though, is that we have to provide them with the tools to proceed," he says. "We need enough to make sure everyone can reach their potential, but [at the same time], we have to pay off the debt over our heads. If we keep that debt over us, our children and their children will be hampered."

Michael Murton

The PCs have a plan to pay off the debt in 25 years, he says.

Murton's wife is a principal at Branksome Hall, a Toronto private school, "so I have a unique perspective on private school funding. We would like to see a tax credit available for parents who do not use the public school system.

"There should be some compensation. We can't see that the tax credit would equal the tuition, but it would create a fairer playing field."

The UN vote, he says, "was deplorable. I'm not sure that the government understood what it was doing. The conflict has been going on for too long to make simplistic decisions.

"I believe the correct stance would have been not to vote. Canada's role has always been the peacemaker, and if we don't act as peacemaker, we will never bring people to the table. We cannot say one side is right or wrong."

John Wakelin, 36, the Alliance Party candidate, says that his constituents are frustrated that the health-care budget was cut before anything else. "Transfer payments to the provinces were cut, and when that is cut, health care is cut."

It is the role of the provinces to provide social programs, he says, and it is the Alliance position to pass a law preventing any government from slashing health dollars. "We may be fiscally conservative, but not when it comes to health care."

By applying 75 percent of the surplus to the debt, he says, it can be eliminated in 50 years. "Some of that surplus will be allocated to social programs."

Wakelin supports his party "100 percent in its policy to fund separate schools. We believe there should be tax accommodation in order to make things easier for parents. It seems reasonable to me."

The UN vote to sanction Israel was "an abomination," Wakelin says. "Israel has made unprecedented concessions in trying to secure peace, and the Canadian government totally misunderstood the manner in which war is being waged in Israel.

"The west should be prepared to stand behind Israel to protect security, and we've done exactly the opposite."

At press time, the New Democratic Party candidate, Ali Naqvi, was unavailable for an interview.

Election 2000

Liberals expected to retain support in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal Jews appear ready to continue giving the Liberals their overwhelming support in the Nov. 27 election, even if it is without enthusiasm, in the opinion of most close political observers contacted.

The reasons are varied: habit, lack of comfortable alternatives, strong local Liberal candidates, and diminishing anger over the government's criticism of Israel's handling of the Palestinian uprising.

If the Liberals have anything to be concerned about, it may be an apathy about the election that could translate in not bothering to vote.

"There will be no shift in the traditional support of Montreal Jews for the Liberals," affirmed Côte St. Luc Mayor Robert Libman.

"A good 30 percent of Jewish voters live in Mount Royal [riding] and they will have no trouble voting for Irwin Cotler, even if they may hold their nose or grumble while they do it. Chrétien's apology for the United Nations vote also won a few people back."

Elsewhere, Libman thinks there may be a "small, small dropping off, but it will have no impact on the re-election of the Liberal candidates."

> 'It's time for a change'

The disaffected, he believes, will not vote at all because he doubts many Jews would vote for the Canadian Alliance.

He will be watching the results in Pierrefonds-Dollard, where Neil Drabkin – who is Jewish and a former Conservative – is running for the Alliance.

"[Liberal incumbent] Bernard Patry has not been very visible, and the riding has a sizeable Jewish population. It will be interesting to see if Drabkin can make any inroads because of anti-Liberal feeling."

(There is also a Jewish Alliance candidate in Lachine-Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, Darrin Etcovitch, 26, who says he voted Reform in 1997. The Jewish population is small in his riding, and the UN vote was not part of his decision to run.)

McGill University professor Morton Weinfeld, a sociologist with expertise in Canadian Jewry, did not hesitate to state that Montreal Jews remain "overwhelmingly Liberal.

"There may be some slippage because of the UN resolution, [and because some Canadians think it is time for a change of the guard... But certainly the Alliance has not made much impression on the Jews of Quebec."

Hampstead Mayor Irving Adessky said Jews admire Cotler's outspoken criticism of his own government as a "principled stand" and will want to endorse him.

"The only question in Mount Royal is how high will his majority be?" (It was 92 per cent in the byelection one year ago.)

In other ridings, "there is still consternation, but I think when people get into the voting booth they will not see much option besides the Liberals," said Adessky.

The only problem the Liberals may have is getting the vote out, Adessky thinks. (The turnout was only 28 per-cent in the 1999 Mount Royal byelection.)

This is due to a general apathy about the election, rather than protest, he said. "I won't be here Nov. 27, so I voted in the advance poll. But what I hear from other people who will be away, is why bother? What does my vote count?

"People are turned off by this election. There's no buzz in the air," Adessky said.

"Jews may be unhappy, but that is not going to translate into a vote for any of the opposition parties, to which there's no strong attachment," said Jack Jedwab, director of the Association for Canadian Studies.

"The Alliance has not made any inroads; the Tories are yesterday's news."

The Liberal incumbents in three ridings with significant Jewish populations are cabinet ministers, he noted, and therefore seen as valuable to have as representatives: Stéphane Dion (Saint Laurent-Cartierville), Martin Cauchon (Outremont), and Lucienne Robillard (Westmount-Ville Marie).

"Even if they are upset over the UN vote, Jews see that the issue is not going to be resolved by voting for another party, and it's not likely they are going to stay away from the polls either."

Carolyn Steinman, who ran for the Conservatives in Mount Royal in 1997, is not so sure Montreal Jews will not send a message to the Chrétien government.

"There's a lot of anger and disillusionment, there could be a backlash. Many of my friends say they really like Irwin [Cotler], but he still represents the Liberals. They don't want to vote for anyone else, so they won't vote."

Their disgruntlement is not only due to the UN vote, but other issues such as taxes, health care and the low dollar, she said.

Ben Shoob says he's the only Jew he knows who will openly state he is voting for the Alliance. Shoob, 62, who lives in Mount Royal, said it has nothing to do with the UN vote.

"Usually I don't vote, but it's time for a change. I'm tired of the arrogance of Chrétien and his cronies. I like the Alliance platform; it's time for a tougher government.

"Stockwell Day is a nice guy. He's fresh, he has new ideas... I want to vote for a party that can form a government. The Conservatives can't."

Besides Cotler, two other Jewish Liberals are seeking re-election in ridings with few Jews: Raymonde Folco (Laval West) and Jacques Saada (Brossard-La Prairie). One of Saada's campaign posters was defaced by graffiti equating the swastika and the Star of David.

Election 2000

Eggleton the incumbent in York Centre

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The last time Canadians voted in a federal election, Art Eggleton won York Centre by a commanding margin. The former Toronto mayor, who serves as minister of defence in Jean Chrétien's cabinet, captured 72 percent of the vote, 24,000 more than the nearest challenger.

That was in June 1997, and while his opponents know it will be tough to unseat Eggleton, they believe the Liberals are vulnerable on a number of fronts.

Mark Tweyman, the 19-year-old Tory candidate, is trumpeting the cause of debt reduction on the one hand and Canada's UN vote on a resolution that blamed Israel for the current round of Mideast hostilities, on the other.

Jeffrey Dorfman, 38, the Canadian Alliance candidate, is attacking the Liberals' fiscal and free-spending policies, but like his leader, Stockwell Day, he's making a point of stressing the Alliance's promise of tax support for religious schools as well as the party's strong stand against Canada's UN vote.

The CJN was unable to contact Maurice Coulter, the candidate for the New Democratic Party. Others running include Christopher Black of the Communist party of Canada and Constantine Kritsonis of the Green party.

With a population of more than 107,000, York Centre is home to sizeable Jewish and Italian populations (each estimated at 40 percent of the riding). The riding's southern boundary is Highway 401 and it stretches from the Don River in the east to Jane Street in the west, and as far north as Steeles around Bathurst Street.

Eggleton conceded he has heard voters' complaints about the government's UN vote, but he stresses he is a strong supporter of Israel who has visited the country several times.

As minister of international trade, he signed and facilitated the free trade agreement with the Jewish state, a move that has multiplied trade and investment between the countries, he said.

More recently, he has raised the Jewish community's concerns about the UN vote with the prime minister.

"I am concerned when my community is concerned, and I let that be known in no uncertain terms," he said.

Eggleton said the prime minister is now involved in a greater way in reviewing resolutions that will come before the United Nations.

The prime minister has taken other steps to address the concerns of the Jewish community, Eggleton continued. Chrétien "made representations" to the Lebanese government about three Israeli soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah, and he has met with Jewish leaders and opened a direct channel to make sure their views are heard.

"The bottom line is that a repeat of that Security Council resolution is simply not going to happen," he said.

Art Eggleton

Dorfman, the Alliance candidate, said many voters have expressed disillusionment with Canada's UN vote. Canada has voted against Israel on many occasions, he said, "and on that basis I'm finding a lot of support for the Canadian Alliance and for myself in the riding."

Tweyman, a student at York University, suggested Canada's UN vote "condemned a country for trying to defend itself."

Eggleton "should have condemned Canada's vote… I'm completely appalled that he did not do that… [Eggleton] has lost the trust of the Jewish people," he said.

Dorfman, who works in the financial services industry, said the electorate is intrigued by the Alliance's promotion of a tax credit scheme for parents who send their children to religious schools.

"I'm taking this issue and running with it."

Jeffrey Dorfman

Dorfman, who sends his children to Eitz Chaim, an Orthodox day school, blasted the government for sending $120 million per year to the Palestinian Authority, "but not being willing to spend that money on independent day schools. There is something wrong with our priorities."

Eggleton said the federal government has asked the province of Ontario to honour a UN human rights finding that called the current funding practice discriminatory.

Tweyman said he opposes public funding for religious schools. "The idea really gets to me. I can't see it in a multicultural society."

Dorfman, who does not campaign on Shabbat, said he must overcome a perception among Jewish voters that the Alliance is tinged by prejudice.

"Until I clear up the issue of racism, Jewish people are reticent to vote for the Alliance. When I clear it up, people are stepping up and making a difference to my campaign."

Dorfman said he has spoken with Alliance leader Stockwell Day about media reports that the school he administered in the 1980s included in its curriculum a statement that Jews were children of the devil. That was never taught when Day was at the school, he said, adding Day "treats everybody as an individual and as an equal."

Eggleton said the Liberals and the Alliance offer different visions of Canada. "I hope they will look at the broader issue… It's in their interests to have a strong voice at the cabinet table."

Health care dominates in St. Paul's riding

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Health care has emerged as a big concern in Toronto's St. Paul's riding, according to candidates for the major parties.

Carolyn Bennett

Liberal incumbent Carolyn Bennett, a physician, found this to be "a huge worry in terms of the future" for people in the riding.

"I have worked to develop national standards for health care, as well as fairer tax treatment for people with disabilities," she told The CJN.

Bennett was first elected to the House of Commons in 1997. A member of the standing committee on justice and human rights and the chair of the sub-committee on status of persons with disabilities, most recently she has been chair of the Liberal Women's Caucus and of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group.

Theo Caldwell

"I have an amazing relationship with the Jewish community," she said. She was one of the three caucus members to question Canada's support of the Security Council's motion condemning Israel for the recent violence.

The Chrétien government is re-committed to a balanced approach towards the Middle East, she said.

She said that while she agrees with the United Nations decision that government funding for only Catholic schools is unfair, she is "not sure just what the answer is."

Barry Cline

Canadian Alliance candidate Theo Caldwell, an investment adviser and financial planner, said that he believes in the party's commitment to reducing government waste and lowering taxes.

On the other hand, he said, the Alliance is "the only party to commit to immediately restore $18.7 billion to the health care system," which, he added, has been "gutted" by the Liberal party.

Caldwell agrees with Stockwell Day that "it is not right that only one religion has its education system funded."

Caldwell said that there should be tax incentives for those who choose to send their children to independent schools.

Canada is not "the friend we should be" to Israel, Caldwell went on. He called the Security Council vote to condemn Israel "shameful – a disgrace."

Canada, as a temporary member of the Security Council, "should lobby for fair treatment of Israel by the international community."

Guy Hunter

Progressive Conservative candidate Barry Cline, called the Liberal government "an arrogant government led by an arrogant prime minister."

As for health care, Cline said that the PC party has promised that if elected, "within one week, all the money taken from health-care transfer funds would be restored."

While Cline declined to comment on funding for independent schools, saying it is solely a provincial matter, he noted that the PC party has promised to give financial and tax assistance to those in post-secondary educational institutions.

As a Jew, Cline said, "I stand with the community" in its condemnation of the Security Council resolution vote.

He considers that he is not alone in this philosophy, since the party, including Joe Clark, is a strong supporter of the Jewish state.

Civil litigation lawyer Guy Hunter is running for the NDP. He believes that the United Nations should focus on "what it does best, like health matters," rather than on what is going on in the Middle East.

The federal budget surplus, for instance, he said, should be used to help the world's poor, rather than on peacekeeping.

Don Roebuck

The recent federal tax cuts, he says, are "imprudent." The Liberal government "has balanced the budget by cutting transfer payments for education and health care."

Hunter is opposed to independent schools, saying "I would rather see the Jewish tradition of enthusiasm for education infused into the public system."

The Green Party candidate in St. Paul's, Don Roebuck, is especially concerned about the environmental impact of the economy on the planet and on future generations.

While the Green Party has no position on the Middle East, Roebuck, who is Jewish, said that he considers the resolution to be one-sided, and served only to encourage violence.

The party believes in equal funding for all religious schools, he said.

Antonio Maristanes is also running in St. Paul's. as an independent.

Liberal victory likely

By JACK JEDWAB
Special to The CJN

On Nov. 27, Canadians will head to the polls and in all likelihood re-elect the Liberals under Jean Chrétien to a majority government.

Opinion

The way things currently stand, the results will be very similar to those of the general elections of 1997, an indication that many of the same tendencies that culminated in the previous distribution of seats are still very much with us today.

The one important exception to the previous pattern may be the continued erosion of the New Democratic Party (NDP) and the federal Conservatives, leaving the other three parties to consolidate their respective strongholds – the Canadian Alliance in Western Canada, the Liberal party of Canada concentrated east of the province of Manitoba, and the Bloc Québécois again capturing the majority of Quebec seats.

As the voters of Ontario stand behind the winning party, they will also have significant representation in the cabinet. On the other hand, much of the Western Canadian and Quebec electorates will fight for the official opposition roles that they have each had the opportunity to assume.

Of course, both the NDP and the Alliance parties hope that the Liberals are reduced to a minority government, in which case, their respective denials notwithstanding, a Day-Duceppe strategic entente would by no means be out of the question.

What some might conceive of as an unholy alliance is a reality of the continued polarization of politics along regional lines.

The Jewish community of Canada is affected by this polarization in that the candidates whom it elects to the government tend to be from Ontario, and to a lesser extent, Quebec.

Therefore, communal lobbying efforts are very much dependent on the political and demographic weight of the Jewish communities.

Political sensitivities to the concerns of Canadian Jewry have just been tested with the Liberal government's condemnatory vote on Israel. Perhaps the precursor to all this was the uncertainty that Chrétien displayed on his trip to the Middle East as he was torn between advisors more sympathetic to the Palestians and others more sympathetic to the Israelis.

The prime minister, who only a couple of years ago visited the concentration camps in Poland, is widely regarded as a friend of Canadian Jewry. Yet the 30-year-plus veteran of Canadian politics is being torn in different directions both within his party ranks and amongst the electorate.

In the aftermath of the UN vote, a number of Canadian Jews seemed ready to issue a protest vote. While publicly condemning the move, community leaders were also torn by the desire of a number of Canadian Jews to

Election 2000

'We're here for you...'

CJN: Even before the United Nations vote [on Resolution 1322, condemning Israel], you made a concerted effort to reach out to our community. Why?

Day: Actually, I've made a concerted effort to reach out to all Canadians. In the Jewish community, there are issues that are important to the Canadian Alliance, certainly important to me. It's a natural progression, of coming along the side of various groups and saying, "We're here for you and we care about your issues."

CJN: Our readers may have concerns about the Canadian Alliance and about you personally... the association with intolerance, its position on the political spectrum, your personal background. What can you say that will allay those concerns?

Day: ...That is a rear-view issue. The Canadian Alliance is the most ethnically diverse caucus in the House of Commons. You just have to sit there during Question Period and look down and see that. And our political opponents have tried a number of what we call tactics of tainting to try and throw people off our agenda. Politically, it has failed. Our candidates, as we have seen in the field, [have a] very significant ethnic diversity, so much so, that it's hardly even an issue. We are beyond tokenism. We are significantly embraced by ethnic groups without exception across the country, and it's because they perceive the Canadian Alliance's position, and my position, as one of openness and embracing all people and one of wanting to represent all people.

CJN: Our readers may have trouble warming to the Canadian Alliance because it has been so publicly endorsed by people like Doug Christie [lawyer to neo-Nazis and Holocaust deniers]. What is your response?

Day: I think people need to recognize the attempts, the lengths, some will go to to try and taint another political party, especially when that party is growing in popularity. For anybody to say that because someone asked – and I don't know this – but someone asked Doug Christie which party he was going to vote for federally; to suggest that has anything to do with our policy would be as bizarre as suggesting that the Liberal candidate in Calgary, who has been exposed as a [one-time] Communist in Afghanistan, that that would mean Jean Chrétien is supporting Communist affiliations in Afghanistan. It would be ridiculous to assume that. Some in the media love to take tiny, I would even say even minuscule statements and blow them up to be things they are not. I hope most people will see through that.

CJN: Three or four months ago, there was a very long article in [Toronto's] NOW magazine [which examined Day's Christian fundamentalist roots in Alberta and alleged he had connections with figures on the extreme right]. Would you, on the record, publicly dissociate yourself from any philosophy or beliefs propounded by people like [Ernst] Zundel or [Jim] Keegstra?

Day: I have done it many times and I will continue to do that. And I would suggest a couple of things when you talk about NOW magazine. First of all, people need to consider the source. In politics, when people see another party growing in popularity, those who are concerned at the loss of power will do almost anything to try and change that. To me, it's been personally very heartbreaking to see this absolutely unfactual, untruthful attempt. I think the fact that I have large support in the Jewish community shows that most people see it as false. They know, and I have stated clearly and I continue to say it, that I would never have anything to do with either the historical or personal perspectives of people like Jim Keegstra or Zundel. Never, in any way, shape or form. And when I say hurtful, [it's] because of the fact that I have lifelong relationships that are very meaningful to me with Jewish people. To me, this is one of the worst attempts. It's like asking the question, "Do you abuse your wife?" Once the question's been asked, then it continues to be out there.

So unfortunately, I will continue to go on the record and say this. But of course, that works, again, for those who are trying to taint me. Because then they say, "There! You see? It's come up again." I have absolutely denounced anything to do with those suggestions, in any way, shape or form.

CJN: The NOW article made a big deal of the fact that you took your car to Keegstra's garage and said that you made a point of being the first after Keegstra's trial to be at the garage. Is that true?

Day: Absolutely ridiculous. These are types of things that continue to bother me. I haven't followed the legal action closely, but representatives of our party have talked to NOW magazine about the legal ramifications they may face if they continue this ridiculous and unsubstantiated tainting process.

CJN: We've read that the organized Arab community is irritated at you for your vociferous support of Israel and categorical condemnation of the government's voting record at the UN. Do you have plans to meet with them?

Day: I've spoken to a number of leaders in that community and made it very clear that the Canadian Alliance and myself personally, do things based on principle, especially issues like this. Yes, I knew very clearly that my statement on UN Resolution 1322 would cause some concerns. [But] I did those things and said those things because they were the right things to do. There are times, if you're going to be in leadership, that you have to make hard decisions based on what is right, not based on what is politically expedient. I have asked those particular leaders to consider what I said. I was not denouncing them. I was saying very clearly that this resolution was unbalanced, unfair, and should not have been passed.

I think we've seen from the prime minister's reaction since then [that] he's realized it shouldn't have been done. Under pressure, he's tried to cover both sides. I continue to make it clear that the Canadian Alliance is here to promote a strong and healthy country, and work with all our citizens. But when we see something we think is offside or unfair, I'm going to speak out. I realize that among some people, it may cost us from time to time in terms of support. I think most citizens though, have a sense of fairness and I'll have to trust them. With that sense of fairness, they'll see that I did something based on principle, not attack one group...

CJN: What is your party's position on the government's Clarity Act [which seeks to impose conditions on a possible unilateral declaration of independence by Quebec]?

Day: We support the act itself. If there's going to be as profound a question as a referendum on the country dissolving, then the question needs to be clear. So I supported that. There were a number of issues that were not clear, however. The percentage of the vote that would be acceptable, who would negotiate – that hasn't been made clear. The question has to be clear. The ramifications of the vote, who's involved, what kind of negotiations, are also important. I support an international standard of 50 percent plus one. When we accepted Newfoundland into Confederation, they barely scraped 50 percent of the vote, and we said that was acceptable. The last referendum was barely 50 percent, and we said that was acceptable. So that's the international standard. But our constitutional position toward Quebec says the whole Clarity Act is plan B. But plan A is constitutional peace [through] recognizing the constitutional jurisdiction between federal and provincial areas of authority. And when I talk about that in Quebec, there's a great deal of support for our position, [for]

'I've always defended Israel'

CJN: Immigration minister Elinor Caplan has unleashed an attack on the Canadian Alliance [in which she said the party's supporters are "Holocaust deniers, prominent bigots and racists."] Do you think this is a sentiment prevalent among other Liberals?

Chrétien: She spoke for herself. She's very emotional about these problems. And she referred to people who are quite well-known for their views, who used to be members of the Reform-Alliance group. You have to live with the political climate in which we are at this time. I asked everybody to cool down. They are shooting at me from all sides on a daily basis. So Madame Caplan replied very strongly.

CJN: You called on all parties to tone down the rhetoric. But at the same time, you said far-right extremists are supporting the Alliance. Can you explain?

Chrétien: These people, Mr. [Doug] Christie and Mr. [Jim] Keegstra, are well known in Canada. They are not asking the people to vote for me. This I know. But apparently they are not members of the Alliance anymore. It's better, but the reality is…I've known Christie for a long time, and he's certainly not a friend of mine.

CJN: Stockwell Day said it's not fair to introduce personal religious beliefs and convictions into the campaign. Do you agree?

Chrétien: I've always been very careful on these things, but you have to live somewhat with what [Day] said in the past. It's not me who introduced that. It was the CBC. It was a program on CBC. It was not done by the Liberals party. [The program on CBC's Magazine] was about [Day's] views and seems to have well-documented them. I'm not too pre-occupied. Everybody knows I'm a Roman Catholic but I'm very careful…The separation of church and state, I feel very strongly about that. I voted, for example, in the House of Commons on abortion, to permit free choices for women, despite the fact my religion does not want me to do that. But I say that I cannot impose my morality on others if I don't want others to impose their morality on me.

This is part of the political debate. It's legitimate to talk about some issues of that nature. But I'm asking everybody to talk about programs. I've been the victim of more personal attacks than [in] any other previous federal election. But I know why. They know they cannot attack the performance of the government.

CJN: Many people in our community say your recent statement to the Jewish leadership on Canada's vote at the UN was insincere and an attempt to help Liberal [candidates] in Toronto who might be in trouble. What is your response?

Chrétien: My views are very well known over a very long period of time. I've always defended an independent Israel with secure borders, and…supported the presence of Canadian troops in the Sinai and Golan Heights and so on. Even a few weeks ago, Prime Minister [Ehud] Barak was asking me to make phone calls. The majority of people in Israel and the majority of the people in Palestine want to have peace. So I called the president of Syria, President [Hosni] Mubarak of Egypt, the crown prince of Saudi Arabia and I called Chairman [Yasser] Arafat too to urge them to support and put pressure [on] the process of peace. But people know me for many, many years. My views [have been] known for a long, long time.

CJN: Mr. Day has made inroads in our community with his promise of federal tax credits for tuition at Ontario's religious schools. Your party has been silent on this issue. Can you comment?

Chrétien: [The] funding of religious schools in Ontario is a provincial problem. We have nothing to do with the operation of the schools. We are putting pressure on the provincial government, but education is a provincial matter…you use your political power on the provincial authority. I'm not a conservative provincially, I'm a liberal.

CJN: Mr. Day and to some extent Mr. Clark accuse you and the Liberal government of not consulting with the provincial governments but rather just ramming policies down their throats. How do you respond?

Chrétien: We just signed an agreement with the provinces. It's financing for the next five years. We signed an agreement with them the same day on early childhood development – $2.2 billion. We signed, a few days after that, the infrastructure agreement with all the provinces of Canada. When we signed, both sides signed. Mr. Clark shoots at me because I'm there. I look at the record. The economy is doing very well. Lowest unemployment in a generation. After many, many years of deficits, we're dealing with a surplus. We're investing in education and training and many programs. And we're looking forward to the future. That is what I'm telling all the electors.

Constitutional respect gets Quebec support constitutional peace through a co-operative understanding of the Constitution, not a confrontational approach.

CJN: The Quebec government is on record as saying it does not want to revive the federalist option.

Day: That's very clear. So you go to the people. The position I've taken on constitutional peace has moved the Canadian Alliance in terms of support. Four months ago, we were at .5 percent support [in Quebec]. We're now around 11 percent. It's the message of constitutional respect that is getting us great support in Quebec, and pulling people who were formerly faced with the decision of Jean Chrétien or separatism. And many people in Quebec say, "Please don't give me that choice."

CJN: Some of our readers have been drawn to your promise of federal tax credits against tuition at religious schools. As you know, there already is a tax credit of about one-third. How would yours work, and how would it avoid interfering in provincial jurisdictions? Have you costed it out?

Day: We've done some rough costing. It would not be a big budgetary item. The federal government has a legitimate constitutional obligation when it comes to religious minorities. And so [the Alliance pledge] is a fulfilling of that. The federal government also has the ability through the tax system to recognize the provision of the public good. People educating their own children, or providing a school system, is the provision of a very significant public good. And as they do that with their own money, their tax dollars go to support the public system. So the public system is getting a double benefit. The federal government allows a tax credit for parents who are setting aside money for their children's post-secondary education – the Education Tax Credit. The federal government is saying, "That's the performance of a public good. That's worthy of credit." And so they allow it. We're simply saying the same thing. The provision of education from kindergarten to Grade 12 is a public good. And we will work out, with those who are providing that, a credit that will significantly deflect the costs.

"On the day of the lynching [when two Israeli soldiers were murdered by a mob in Ramallah] the lead of the story said [Israeli] air raids sent Palestinians running for cover and that Israel smashed the peace process. It said nothing about the lynchings. I thought it was ridiculous. That was the last straw for me. I cancelled my subscription."

Schwartz said she was particularly offended by an editorial cartoon that depicted a Star of David made of barbed wire. "I thought it was extremely insensitive. The Star knows that there are hundreds of Holocaust survivors living in Toronto. I thought it was just disgusting."

Sokolowski said he was particularly angry after an editorial supported Canada's voted at the United Nations. "The Star backed the position that labeled Israel as the aggressor," he said.

Fuss said the Star contacted him and requested a meeting with Honderich. Sokolowski said he, too, had been contacted by the Star and been asked to meet with the publisher, but Honderich told The CJN Fuss and Schwartz had requested their meeting with him and that he had not been in contact with Sokolowski.

Schwartz and Fuss met with Honderich for about one hour and emerged feeling "not really satisfied" by his response, Fuss said.

"He didn't address our concerns. He said a lot of Arabs are writing in as well and there's a larger Arab population than Jewish. I feel he glossed over our concerns."

"I was extremely dissatisfied with the meeting, but it went pretty much as I expected," Schwartz said. "Every time I put forth a complaint, he changed the subject. Absolutely nothing was accomplished."

As they left the meeting, Honderich's assistant told Fuss the paper would contact him about resuming his ads.

Moments later, when her uncle called his office on his cell phone, he learned that the Star's advertising department had already contacted his office claiming "that because the meeting was such a success, we've taken the liberty of booking a page for you," Schwartz recounted.

Honderich told The CJN the meeting has been arranged through the paper's advertising department, though he maintained "they [Fuss and Schwartz] were the ones who requested the meeting. That's my understanding.

"We had an open and frank discussion. I tried to explain and put things in perspective. We didn't always agree. I tried to explain [the Star's] position."

Honderich said he "personally reviewed the coverage" and found no bias in favour of the Palestinians.

He acknowledged the op-ed page carried few articles from an Israeli perspective but that was because of "an administrative foul-up." He said the Star ran an article from an Israeli perspective "as soon as I became aware of the situation." He also noted that several senior editors in charge of the Star's op-ed, letters and editorial pages are Jewish.

In his letter to former subscribers, Honderich notes "it is our priority to present the news as fairly and accurately as possible…

"I want you to know I have personally reviewed all the dispatches and the way we handled the stories. There is no question some of the images are shocking and some of the events hard to fathom. Yet I have not been able to detect any bias or deliberate slanting of the news against Israel…

"Editorially, the Star has not wavered one iota from its position of deploring the violence on both sides and arguing for continuation of the peace process. Our columnists have reflected their own points of view and we have attempted to reflect all views on our opinions page. Our cartoonists have taken a tough stand against both sides."

That letter prompted a response from Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region.

Landy said the Star's editorials strongly suggest "that Israel and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak were largely to blame for the continuation of violence. In no editorial was there mention of the fact that the Palestinians premeditated this crisis. There was no discussion of the incitement to violence against Israelis…"

The Star's columns and op-eds are "extremely one-sided," Landy wrote in a letter to Honderich.

"For the most part, each of the [Star's three regular] columnists has written pieces… that have been very critical of Israel. The cumulative effect of this is a continuous ganging up on Israel."

The Star has not balanced this with opposing viewpoints, and has turned down "at least two items from an Israeli perspective that were offered to it," Landy stated.

Israeli consul Zehavit Ben Hillel said the consulate had submitted an article by Itamar Rabinovitch, an Israeli negotiator at Oslo, but it had been rejected by the Star for lack of space. "We think that in general, the coverage should be more balanced," she said.

For U.S. Jews, intermarriage not taboo

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

"The Jewish taboo on mixed marriage has clearly collapsed" is the conclusion of the 2000 Annual Survey of American Jewish Opinion, sponsored by the American Jewish Committee (AJC).

Fifty-six percent of the survey's respondents disagreed with the statement "It would pain me if my child married a gentile." Furthermore, 50 percent of the respondents agreed with the statement "It is racist to oppose Jewish-gentile marriages," and 80 percent of respondents said marriage between Jews and gentiles was inevitable in an open society.

The survey was conducted in September using a sample of 1,010 self-identified Jewish respondents who, from a number of perspectives, were considered demographically representative of the adult American Jewish population. The statistical margin of error was 3 percent either way.

A related survey among Jews in the United States in 1990 found that 52 percent of wedding ceremonies involving Jews during the preceding five years had also featured a non-Jewish partner. The finding raised a storm of controversy in the American Jewish community at the time.

Last year, the number of Jews in the United States was 6,062,000 and it is estimated that a million of them have a non-Jewish partner. Intermarriage no longer generates the shockwaves it once used to. Even today concerned American Jews hope "Jewish education" will work miracles.

Apparently, the magic word is really "outreach" – the Jewish community must try to draw the non-Jewish partner of a mixed marriage into the fold.

There are a number of programs aimed at strengthening Jewish identity in America. One of the most important is Operation Birthright, which tries to help every Jewish American teenager to visit Israel, and which develops social environments where young Jewish people cana meet.

A New York nightclub has opened, for example, where (according to one of the rabbis associated with Birthright) "Jews can meet other Jews, get married and have Jewish kids."

Even the network of Hillel clubs – that aims to promote Jewish social activities on American university campuses – has this year launched a special program for teaching Judaism to mixed couples.

Senator Joe Lieberman, Al Gore's Democratic presidential running mate, is an Orthodox Jew, but in a recent interview, he said Judaism does not prohibit intermarriage.

Among the respondents in the AJC survey who said they would not be pained if their child married a non-Jew and would readily accept the marriage, 78 percent said they would want a rabbi to officiate at the mixed wedding ceremony.

Of the respondents, 10 percent defined themselves as Orthodox, 31 percent as Conservative, 31 percent as Reform, and two percent as Reconstructionist – 25 percent termed themselves "just Jewish."

It is perhaps not surprising that 27 percent of the Reform respondents and 57 percent of the Conservative respondents disapproved of their children marrying gentiles. But apparently even among the Orthodox, such opposition is not absolute – 16 percent of them (one in six) could live with the concept of their child married to a non-Jew.

Orthodox and Conservative rabbis refuse to officiate at wedding ceremonies where one of the partners is not Jewish. But Reform rabbis (according to one of them) would have difficulties finding a congregation if they announced in advance that they would not officiate at mixed marriages. There has been an increase in the number of mixed marriage ceremonies where both a rabbi and a member of the (Protestant) clergy officiate.

Yet, even among Orthodox and Conservative American Jews, support is growing for a more effective way of dealing with mixed marriage ceremonies already completed – not by ostracizing the couple, but by involving it in the activities of the congregation in the hope that the husband and wife will give their children a Jewish education.

Of the survey's respondents, 92 percent said Judaism is important in their lives – 81 percent light Chanukah candles and 71 percent celebrate the annual Passover seder.

Some 59 percent of the respondents indicated membership in a synagogue or temple, but only 37 percent attached importance to prayer services. The vast majority (95 percent) of the respondents believe anti-Semitism in one form or another exists in the United States. Nearly half (49 percent) said "most" or "many" of those affiliated with the religious Christian right are anti-Semites and 41 percent believe anti-Semitic sentiments are harboured by "most" or "many" Muslim Americans.

The survey also examined opinions on other subjects, some regarding Israel – 74 percent of respondents said they felt emotionally close to the State of Israel, while only 28 percent said they felt very close. Those who had visited Israel at least once numbered 43 percent, and 57 percent said (within the context of a Palestinian-Israeli peace treaty) that Israel must not concede on Jerusalem.

High Court criticizes state on women at Wall

By MOSHE REINFELD
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Supreme Court sharply criticized the government last week for ignoring an earlier ruling permitting the Women at the Wall group to pray at the Western Wall.

The nine justices last week completed their rehearing, at the government's request, of the verdict it issued six months ago. They will now tour the Wall and the alternative prayer site proposed by the government at Robinson Arch before issuing their decision.

But several justices criticized the government's behaviour during the hearing. Tova Strasberg-Cohen said the government had not even tried to implement the earlier ruling. Eliahu Mazza said a committee set up by the government had ignored the court's directive to focus on enabling the women to pray at the Wall, rather than looking for an alternative site.

Attorney Osnat Mandel, representing the government, responded that the government had not ignored the court; the committee had simply continued to work even after it became convinced that letting the women pray at the Wall was impractical.

Maj.-Gen. Yair Yitzhaki, commander of the Jerusalem police, told the court that prayers by Women at the Wall any place within the Western Wall Plaza were liable to cause rioting. He said haredim object to the fact that the women wear prayer shawls (tallitot) and read from the Torah.

The police, Yitzhaki said, are capable of suppressing the rioting, but the question, he pointed out, remains at what cost.

The women's attorney, Frances Raday, responded that the government should not cave in to extremists who oppose a particular method of prayer.

Justice Mishael Cheshin asked whether the women would be willing to give up some of the external symbols that offend the haredim. "I don't say your opponents are right. But it hurts them," he said.

Raday said this would be unacceptable. A better solution, she said, would be to keep haredi objectors away from the Wall while the group is praying there.

Raday rejected Mandel's contention that Robinson Arch is an extension of the Western Wall Plaza, and is no less holy. One cannot even see the Wall from Robinson Arch, she said. She also said the women would not accept an alternative site on the plaza; they wanted to pray in the existing women's section of the Wall. Since Women at the Wall are an Orthodox group, she said, there is no reason why their presence should offend anyone.

Justice Yaakov Turkel pointed out that other Jewish values are at stake, such as peace and respect for others.

Israeli envoy hurt in shooting attack in Amman

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The vice-consul of the Israeli Embassy in Jordan, Yoram Havivian, was lightly wounded in Amman last Sunday when gunmen tried to assassinate him.

Havivian was hit in the leg and the hand by shots fired from a passing car at 8:30 a.m., while he was stepping into his own car outside his house, in order to drive to work. About 10 bullets were fired, some of which hit the car.

He was treated on the spot by a passing Jordanian doctor and then taken to a nearby hospital for further treatment. A few hours later, he was transferred to Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem. He was expected to be released Monday.

Jordanian authorities have begun investigating the incident.

"The Jordanians have notified us at the highest levels that they will make every effort to catch those responsible and put them on trial, and I believe that that will be the case," Israeli ambassador to Jordan, David Dadon told Ha'aretz. Officials in Jerusalem said they also believe Jordan will do its utmost to find the attackers, as the affair was "very embarrassing" for the Jordanian government.

Jordan's Prince Hassan called Dadon to express sorrow for the attack, an Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson said.

A hitherto unknown organization took responsibility for the attack. The organization is named after Ahmed Dakamseh, the Jordanian soldier who shot and killed seven Israeli schoolgirls at Naharayim in 1997. The group announced yesterday that it intends to continue attacking Israelis in Jordan until Jordan severs relations with Israel.

Havivian was sharply critical of the way Jordanian onlookers behaved, with the exception of the doctor who treated him.

"People just stood there and looked," he said in an interview with Army Radio. "I saw that no one in the area was willing to help; they weren't willing to call the police... I assume that they knew who I am. People who are there regularly know that I am from the Israeli Embassy."

Sources in Jerusalem expressed concern over the high quality of planning evident in the attack.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak called the attack very grave, and said that in co-ordination with the Jordanian authorities, those responsible for the shooting would be caught and brought to justice.

There have been three previous attacks on Israeli Embassy personnel in Jordan. The most recent was in 1999, when an emotionally disturbed Palestinian youth fired at an embassy guard. No one was injured in that incident.

Three terrorists detonated a 120-millimetre shell with a sophisticated fusing mechanism and shot at the bus from a distance of some 200 metres, according to the IDF.

A radical Palestinian group based in Damascus said its Omar al-Mukhtar fighting units were responsible, according to a fax sent to Reuters in Beirut.

Nabil Abu Rdainah, an aide to Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, said the Palestinian Authority was not involved in the bombing. However, he told Reuters that because the blast took place on a road under Israeli control, "it's the Israeli army's responsibility and they have to blame only themselves."

Army spokesperson Maj. Yarden Vatikai said the school bus had a military escort and was armor-plated but that the blast was powerful enough to injure people inside.

"I believe the attack this morning cannot pass without a response by the Israeli government. It's an attack so serious, so low, so contemptible, I believe there's no way to think at all that this can pass without a response," government aide Gilad Sher said.

On Nov. 18, Arafat called on Palestinians to refrain from perpetrating attacks from areas under Palestinian control. Less than 24 hours after that, Staff Sgt. Baruch Snir Flum was shot dead while guarding the Kfar Darom settlement in the Gaza Strip.

The week in Israel

Nov. 13

• Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction called on Palestinians to drive all Israelis from the West Bank, Gaza and eastern Jerusalem.

Nov. 14

• Israel decided not to allow Yasser Arafat to attend the funeral of Leah Rabin.

Nov. 15

• The Dubek tobacco company agreed to pay compensation to smokers whose health has been seriously affected by cigarettes in the past seven years. The compensation fund will be financed by an increase in cigarette prices.

Nov. 16

• U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross held separate talks with Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Arafat to try to end the ongoing violence. After the meeting, Barak told Israelis they should prepare for "a long fight with the Palestinians."

• Supreme Court Justice Theodore Orr will head a state commission of inquiry into the recent killing of 13 Israeli Arabs during clashes with police. The deputy president of the Nazareth district court, Sahal Jarrah, and former ambassador to Egypt Shimon Shamir will also be part of the commission.

Nov. 17

• The government announced it will impose tough economic sanctions against the PA. The IDF has been ordered not to allow any goods to enter PA territories, apart from food and medicines. Israel will also withhold millions of dollars in tax revenues owed to the PA. The transfers have been halted as part of Israel's demand that the Palestinians start honouring their agreements.

Israel at top of agenda at this year's GA

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

CHICAGO — With the intense focus on Israel at last week's General Assembly of United Jewish Communities (UJC), other Jewish concerns tended to take a back seat.

But the diversity and abundance of sessions, the sheer number of delegates (4,500, plus 2,000 locals) and the calibre of speakers all contributed to an immense educational/intellectual/cultural smorgasbord.

"This is phenomenal," said community volunteer Jackie Winestock of Winnipeg, one of about 150 Canadian delegates. "You come to something like this, and you realize you do count."

Victor Goldberg, outgoing president of the Atlantic Jewish Council, said it's always fascinating and energizing to attend a gathering such as the GA.

He plans to share what he gleaned in Chicago about UJA campaigns and Jewish life with his community of 1,500 in Halifax and another 1,000 in the Atlantic region.

The sessions not specifically devoted to Israel covered a wide range of topics, including interfaith issues, Jewish education, text study and career opportunities.

Perhaps the most innovative session was A Conversation with Maimonides and Carnegie. The discussion on philanthropy featured New York author Rabbi Joseph Telushkin as Maimonides, barefoot and caftaned, with a colourful metallic striped turban.

Philanthropy, or campaign/financial resource development, is one of four "pillars" of UJC, the entity formed last year by the merger of UJA, United Israel Appeal (UIA) and the Council of Jewish Federations.

The organization – the umbrella for 189 federations – is expected to raise about $820 million US this year. Its pillars – which also include Jewish renaissance and renewal, human services and social policy, and Israel and overseas – were the main focus of last year's GA in Atlanta.

Last week, UJC's top professional delivered a speech that focused more on the institutional changes federations need to make than it did on Israel.

"Our infrastructure needs to be majorly overhauled if we're going to continue to be relevant," Stephen Solender, UJC's president and chief executive officer, said. He cited the need for more designated giving opportunities, and a collective responsibility for maintaining and enhancing a central fund-raising and funding system for local, national and overseas needs.

"The organization is very much in the middle of restructuring and finding itself," said Harvey Wolfe of Montreal.

Although the Canadian flag was displayed prominently, Wolfe, a former president of UIA Federations Canada, noted a dearth of Canadians chairing programs.

Allan Reitzes, executive director of UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, said that from his perspective, however, Canada is "very much a part of it."

He and Alan Sandler, president of Toronto's federation, co-chair UJC's large-city presidents and executives, representing the 19 largest communities in North America.

Until the crisis in Israel began, the theme of this year's GA was learning. There were over a dozen concurrent "GA University" sessions, organized by Brandeis University, and a Hebrew mini-ulpan.

The importance of the latter was underscored by octogenarian author Herman Wouk. Speaking at the official opening from the perspective of an observant Jew, he said the most important thing to learn is conversational Hebrew.

When you speak Hebrew to Israelis in Israel, he said, "their faces light up, and suddenly you're their brother or sister, because you're speaking the language."

Solidarity with Israel was a virtually constant theme.

The 45 university students from Montreal – the largest contingent among 800 students – expressed solidarity by waving Israeli flags and singing songs like Am Yisrael Chai before Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak's speech.

"They made me proud," said Wolfe, the Montrealer who felt Canadians were under-represented. The Montreal federation sets aside money to fund student participation, he noted.

Sara Ahronheim, a fourth-year biology student at Queen's University in Kingston, told The CJN she now felt "better equipped to deal with the situation on my campus." She is considering working for the Jewish community for a year. "I kind of want to give back to the community," she said.

Evening concerts included performances by singers Aviv Geffen and Noa, and by Israeli rock group Reva L'Sheva.

Barak delivers peace message to Jewish assembly

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CHICAGO — In a speech that was the centerpiece of the North American Jewish federation system's gathering in Chicago last week, Israel's prime minister recalled hearing as a small child of the United Nations' 1947 vote to partition Palestine.

That period – when the Jews' willingness to split the land was rebuffed by Arabs, precipitating Israel's War of Independence – can be seen as a parallel to today's situation.

Ehud Barak spoke to thousands of Jews at a rally meant as a show of solidarity for the embattled state.

With Monday's rally, unprecedented security measures, about 2,500 Arabs demonstrating outside and a bevy of Israel-related programming, it was not a typical GA.

Security was unusually stringent at the assembly site, a sprawling downtown hotel. Amid intense fighting between Israel and the Palestinians – and concurrent worldwide anti-Semitic attacks – the heightened security was clearly intended as a precaution against any terrorist actions.

Barak's message, however, was one of peace. Israel must be "liberated from the crushing burden of never-ending war," he said.

The Israeli prime minister also squarely blamed the Palestinians for the violence and outlined several conditions – including a "Jerusalem broader than it has ever been" – for a peace agreement.

A speech given early Tuesday morning by opposition leader Ariel Sharon had a somewhat different tone.

Sharon outlined his own plan for peace and criticized Barak for asking U.S. President Clinton to help bring about a reduction, rather than a cessation, in violence.

In a separate session, MK Natan Sharansky said that Israel has no chance of survival if it continues giving messages of weakness.

"Of course we must go back to the negotiating table, but we must take ourselves back from the track of Camp David… Now we know what it means that Arafat will take care of our security."

Although discussion of religious pluralism was notably absent from the assembly, the issue has not gone away, said Alan Sandler, president of Toronto's federation.

"I think we've got to work on pluralism, but that came off the agenda this year because of Israel."

In speech after speech, Israeli leaders spoke gratefully of North American Jews as partners and family, thanked them for their solidarity missions, urged them to defend Israel in the media and asked them to visit Israel.

"Come to Israel not only because our hotel rooms are empty," said Yuli Tamir, Israel's minister of absorption, "but because we don't want our hearts to be empty."

Obituary

Longtime Reform leader dies at 75

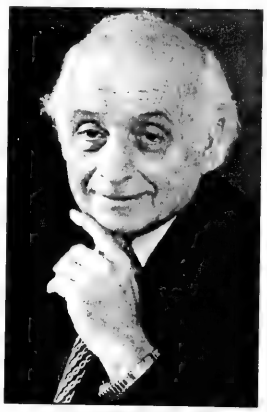
By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Rabbi Alexander Schindler, the longtime leader of the Reform movement best known for his outreach support to intermarried couples and recognition of patrilineal descent, has died at the age of 75.

He died last Wednesday morning from heart failure at his home in Westport, Conn.

As president of Reform Judaism's Union of American Hebrew Congregations from 1973 to 1996, Schindler – who viewed Judaism as a dynamic faith – championed a number of dramatic changes.

Schindler devised a controversial "outreach" program challenging Jews to become "champions of Judaism," reversing the tradition of discouraging proselytizing.



Rabbi Alexander Schindler

He also called on the Jewish community to welcome intermarried couples into synagogue life and supported patrilineal descent, the controversial notion that a child with a Jewish father and gentile mother can be considered Jewish if the child is raised Jewish.

Under Schindler's tenure, the Reform movement officially embraced patrilineal descent in the mid-1980s, something more traditional Jews have sharply criticized, saying it was a major blow to Jewish unity.

Interviewed by JTA earlier this year, Schindler said he had no regrets about the decision and said it was "just not true" that patrilineal descent had caused tensions between Reform and other streams of Judaism.

"When the decision was made, Orthodox rabbis said by the year 2000 we'd be two Jewish people," he said. "It hasn't happened."

Schindler also championed equality for women in Judaism, as well as acceptance of gay and lesbian Jews.

He was a keynote speaker earlier this year at the World Congress of Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Jewish Organizations.

Schindler also oversaw publication of the first Torah commentary written from a Reform perspective.

Although known for embracing dramatic changes, he also embraced tradition, as evidenced by the speech he gave shortly before he stepped down from leading the UAHC.

"I feared, and still do, that we Reform Jews are entirely too lax in our observances," he said.

"Having asserted our autonomy, insisting on our right to choose, too many among us choose nothing at all, or, choosing something, we observe it only haphazardly."

Schindler was also a key Jewish leader outside the Reform movement. From 1976 to 1978 he served as chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

His tenure coincided with the ascendancy of the late Israeli prime minister, Menachem Begin.

Begin's victory, which ended the decades-long control of the Israeli government by the Labour party, initially alarmed many American Jews, who viewed him as an ideologue.

Although Schindler differed politically with Begin, he promptly visited the prime minister.

After the visit, Schindler told American Jews he found Begin to be a man of "peace and integrity, with a profound devotion to the Jewish people and their security," as he later wrote in an article on highlights of his chairship.

The two became good friends.

At the time of his death, Schindler was serving as president of the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture and vice-president of the World Jewish Congress.

A Jewish National Fund forest of 500,000 trees bears his name.

Born in Germany in 1925, Schindler fled the Nazis with his family, arriving in the United States at the age of 12. He was ordained as a rabbi in 1953, at the Reform movement's seminary, the Hebrew Union College.

He is survived by his wife, Rhea, and five children.

Supreme Court head calls for equality for Israeli Arabs

By DALIA SHEHORI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – Supreme Court President Aharon Barak recently issued a forthright call for complete equality for Israel's Arab citizens.

"Democracy and respect for human dignity require equality," Barak declared at a swearing-in ceremony for seven new judges held at the President's Residence in Jerusalem.

"Without equality, there can be no democracy. Arab citizens among us deserve full, equal rights. The State of Israel is their state. They are its citizens, and are entitled to equal rights."

The integration of Israeli Arabs as full-fledged citizens must be guaranteed "in all strata of Israeli society: in positions of political power, in higher education, in the legal sphere."

Equality must be sought and achieved, Barak added, with respect to the allocation of the nation's resources to Israeli Arabs.

He supported "affirmative action" policies "if they are needed" to guarantee equality for this community.

President Moshe Katsav and Justice Minister Yossi Beilin were among those who attended the ceremony.

A non-official highlight of the event occurred when Barak kissed his wife Elisheva, who was sworn in to serve as deputy president of the national Labour Court.

Israel's character as a Jewish state and as a democracy, Barak stated, "are, in brief, the essence of our lives here."

However, he acknowledged, Israel's Jewish basis and its character as a democracy are liable to clash at times.

In a case of tension between these two cardinal components, Barak said, "The right approach isn't to encourage conflict between the State of Israel's values, but rather to find the common ground between them.

"If each person wants to attain everything, all of us as a people will gain nothing," Barak added.

Regarding the current stand-off with the Palestinian Authority (PA), Barak said that Israel must not display a demoralized attitude, and must remain committed to a consistent policy course.

"These are trying days which demand national compromise, and not national extremism."

Speaking to reporters after the ceremony, Katsav termed recent circumstances involving Palestinian terror attacks "intolerable," and declared that "they cannot continue."

The PA, Katsav added, mistakenly believes that it "can continue with violence, gunfire and bloodshed, while simultaneously continuing diplomatic negotiations."

Palestinian attacks, Katsav concluded, must cease.

He warned that "one of two scenarios will arise: Either the PA will end [violent attacks] or the IDF will compel it to bring the violence to a halt."

For his part, Justice Minister Yossi Beilin expressed doubt yesterday that an IDF crackdown will end the recent spiral of violence.

Such tough IDF retaliation, he suggested, might backfire, "leading to a continued escalation of the situation."

Palestinians want state declared now

By AMIRA HASS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — More than two-thirds (68.5 percent) of Palestinians favour a declaration of statehood even if it means war with Israel.

Bir Zeit University's Development Studies Program established this Palestinian readiness for a showdown with Israel in a two-stage public opinion survey.

In a followup to an earlier survey completed on Sept. 6th, 1,234 respondents from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank were polled between Nov. 6 and Nov. 8 on the intifadah and the peace process.

Exactly 50 percent of Gaza-based respondents (36.3 percent on the West Bank) support such terror attacks against all Israelis, whereas 38 percent of all respondents (30 percent in Gaza and 43 percent in the West Bank) think suicide attacks should be aimed specifically at "military and settler targets."

A vast majority of respondents, 85 percent, said closures that Israel has enforced in the territories since the intifadah outbreak have seriously hurt their economic situation. Some 77 percent said the closure stops at least one family member from getting to work.

Despite the economic woes, three-quarters of respondents want the intifadah to continue. A third of the respondents indicated that the uprising should be continued and fought primarily via military means.

Sixty-eight percent of the people polled see the intifadah's main goal as the "liberation and establishment of an independent Palestinian state." More than three-quarters of the respondents said the intifadah will positively promote Palestinian national goals.

About 30 percent said the intifadah will run its course in another few months, and 25 percent predicted the uprising will go on for years.

Thirty-eight percent of respondents declined to suggest how long it will last.

Culinary lover lands a dream job

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Television executive Karen Gelbart loves to cook.

And that's a good thing, as domestic diva Martha Stewart would say, because Gelbart is the programming vice-president of Food Network Canada.

The Canadian network officially took over the American food channel signal last month, and now Gelbart is serving up a menu of American and Canadian culinary shows.

Describing herself as a "foodie" from "a line of brilliant and distinguished home cooks," Gelbart, 50, said she's landed a "dream job."

The New York native grew up in a household where cooking was taken very seriously, she said in a recent interview at the downtown headquarters of Alliance Atlantis Broadcasting.

"My mother, my sister and I can spend half an hour on the phone discussing the proper way to roll a breast of veal."

She attributes her love of cooking to her mother, a wonderful cook who enjoys preparing all the traditional Jewish dishes and experimenting with avant garde and international cuisines, she said.

And while she has grown up with a love of cooking, her professional foray into the culinary world is a recent development in her 25-year career in journalism and broadcasting.

[Barbara Silverstein photo]

Gelbart, a graduate of the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, began her journalism career as an intern for the London bureau of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, an international Jewish wire service.

She then worked as a reporter and editor for United Press International (UPI) before being transferred to UPI's Montreal bureau in 1975. Two years later, Gelbart went on to work for the CBC in Ottawa and Toronto.

She began as a writer, moving up through the ranks to senior producer for Network television news and News World. "I did every job in the newsroom."

One of the highlights of her journalism career, she said, was following Brian Mulroney's campaign when he was elected prime minister in 1984.

And she was also sent to Mexico to cover the 1985 earthquake which left thousands of people dead. Witnessing "human tragedy on a such a grand scale was a very moving experience."

And while Gelbart was at the CBC, she dabbled in food writing, moonlighting as a restaurant reviewer for Toronto Calendar Magazine and a several community newspapers.

In 1997, she joined Alliance Atlantis as a production executive in the programming department, overseeing projects for Life Network and HGTV (Home and Garden Television).

Gelbart, an avid gardener, said she is as much a consumer of those networks as a programmer.

She stressed that the foundation of the lifestyle shows are rooted in "strong programming values" — the shows have to be interesting, informative and entertaining.

People watch the food shows because the they are entertaining and they afford people the opportunity to learn new skills, she explained.

She noted that 50 percent of the shows airing on the new Canadian network will be American, among them, heavy-weight favourites like Emeril Live!, From Martha's Kitchen, and Iron Chef.

The Canadian lineup includes Dish it Out with Christine Cushing; Canadian Living Cooks with Elizabeth Baird, Daphna Rabinovitch and Emily Richards; and Ken Kostick & Company.

One of the exciting aspects of pioneering the new network is scouting for Canadian culinary talent, said Gelbart. "I'm in touch with all the publishers, the culinary schools and other culinary organizations."

Indeed, cookbooks, manuscripts and magazines are spread neatly on the floor in her tidy office overlooking Bloor and Yonge streets.

And Gelbart is always on the lookout for new exciting recipes for the home front. cooking for her husband, Peter McNelly, a senior producer at ROB Television, and her 13-year-old son Benjamin, who will be bar mitzvahed in December.

Like the viewers, she's inspired by the cooks on the tube, she said. In the summer, Gelbart was watching a tape of Dish It Out when she saw Cushing prepare the perfect brunch dish — a potato and filo dough and cheese recipe.

Gelbart quickly re-wound the tape, wrote down the recipe and served what was a hit dish for her brunch guests, she said.

Being at the helm of a food network has its privileges. And for Gelbart's family and friends, "that's a good thing," to quote Stewart again.

Yentl at Holy Blossom

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yentl, the story of a woman who disguises herself as a man to study Torah in turn-of-the-century Europe, is being presented by the Holy Blossom Temple Stagecraft Company.

"The movie version, starring Barbara Streisand, was tame compared to this play which depicts the obstacles Yentl had to overcome," said director Bill Tepper, a Peel area high school dramatics and English teacher.

Cuban actress tries to find her niche in Israel

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel correspondent

TEL AVIV — Few took notice of Luiza Perez Nieto sitting in a corner at the Tel Aviv Cinematheque café recently.

This well-manicured 52-year-old may look like just another café patron, but she's not. Nieto is one of Cuba's biggest film stars.

When Nieto arrived at the Ye'elim absorption centre in Beersheva eight months ago, the other Cuban immigrants were both thrilled and disappointed to see her.

On the one hand, it's not every day that a Cuban movie star makes aliyah. On the other hand, her move to Israel suggested her illustrious acting career had all but come to an end.

"They said, 'Oh no! Now you won't be able to continue acting,'" she says, over coffee. "The other Cubans suggested that I teach acting instead."

Though her Hebrew is still rudimentary – and this interview was conducted with the help of a translator – Nieto is far from calling it quits in the world of acting.

"I still want to work in theatre and acting here," she says. "I don't want to teach acting."

With a global revival in Cuban films and the September Cuban film festival at the Tel Aviv Cinematheque, it looks like Nieto doesn't have to give up just yet.

In recent years, Cuban culture has witnessed a reawakening. While some point to Wim Wenders's film, The Buena Vista Social Club, as getting the ball rolling in focusing the world's attention on Cuba's entertainment scene, others suggest the numerous accolades Cuban filmmakers have received at international festivals is the catalyst behind the new hype.

Nieto, for example, won the Best Female Actress Award in a Latino movie at a New York film festival in 1990 for her role in Orlando Rojas's Supporting Roles.

Regardless of why people are suddenly tuning in to the Cuban entertainment scene, the island's film industry is definitely abuzz.

In fact, major European and North American production companies in the last few years have teamed up with Cuban teams. Nurith Tzarfati, head of special projects at the Tel Aviv Cinematheque, visited Havana last September. While there, Tzarfati says she was intrigued by the scene and asked the Cuban Film Institute, known by its Spanish acronym of ICAIC, if it would be possible for her to bring some of their films to Israel.

"The Cinematheque has movies from all over the world," Tzarfati explains. "From Japan, the Far East, etc. We bring films other movie theatres don't buy. They only buy from America. There was never a partnership with Cuba – this is the first time.

"Cuba is not just dancing and salsa," she says, referring to what she believes is the majority's view of this small island. "There are intellectuals there and they have something to say.

"People think The Buena Vista Social Club is Cuban," she continues. "But, it doesn't show what Cuban life is really about."

The film, Supporting Roles, in which Nieto stars, is about the competition, love, and conflict that arises during casting and production of a classic Cuban play. As well as winning for her role in this film, Nieto has also won awards for her roles as a TV soap star in the show Seventh Family.

Since her debut as Megaera, the lead female role in Bernard Shaw's Androcles and the Lion in 1972, Nieto has been a household name. She has worked in television, film, theatre and radio. From her work over the last 28 years, and her animated conversation style, it is obvious that acting is where Nieto belongs.

Yet, despite her achievements in Cuba, Nieto, who wears a large Magen David pendant around her neck, says she never really felt at home in the Communist country.

"I see myself as belonging here," she says of Israel. "I have always been Jewish and nothing else." Despite a hectic rehearsal schedule, Nieto says she tried to go to synagogue every Saturday, and always went on holidays. Making aliyah was fulfilling a lifetime ambition, she says, even if it meant giving up some of her star status.

"I don't feel like a star, but an actor," she explains, then justifying her move she adds: "It is not so comfortable to be too famous."

She says life in Israel and Cuba is very similar, and she sometimes forgets where she is. However, one difference that bothers her is that people don't smile here as often as they do in Cuba.

"In Cuba, things are done with a smile," she says, baring her teeth. "People smile less here."

She also notes that she misses her family and friends, but adds that she doesn't miss the life on the island.

Nieto lives with her daughter and her son-in-law in Beersheva. She has a sister in Ashkelon and another sister still in Havana. Though she is happy to be surrounded by other Cubans at the absorption centre, Nieto says she hopes to soon find her own apartment, somewhere on the water.

"I don't care where I live," she says. "I just miss the sea." Nieto adds that although life is far from perfect here, she doesn't regret her move.

"I'm not disappointed at all," she says. "I hear classical music here and I dance salsa. The only thing I don't do is go to the theatre."

And though the theatre is her first love, travelling is a close second. Nieto says one of the reasons she moved to Israel was so that she could be more central to other countries.

Yentl, played by Susanne Egier, one of the company's founders, challenges the male-dominated society of the shtetl. Other leads are played by Adam Sol and Rhonda Tepper in the 15-member cast.

Based on Isaac Bashevis Singer's famous short story, the play was adapted by Singer and Leah Napolin.

It carries on the tradition of provocative plays presented under the late Basya Hunter's direction at Holy Blossom Temple.

This is the 12th production of the Holy Blossom group. Previous plays have included Counsellor-at-law, The Tenth Man, and Broken Glass – all directed by Tepper.

All members of the cast, including its director, are members of the Temple.

Performances are on Dec. 7, 9 and 10, at 7.30 p.m. in the Eisendrath Auditorium at the temple, 1950 Bathurst St., 416-789-3291, ext. 511. Tickets are $10 in advance, $12 at the door, with seniors and students admitted for $6 on Thursday and Sunday only.

San Francisco: A wonderful place to leave your heart

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

SAN FRANCISCO — It is understandable that crooner Tony Bennett left his heart in San Francisco – many people do! This northern California city by the bay boasts breathtaking scenery, interesting sites, exciting attractions and arts and culture throughout the day and well into the night.

Over every steep hill, there is something in San Francisco to marvel at. If sightseeing is your passion, there are tours by boat, cable car and bus, or you can go on foot. A great way to get a feel for the city is take a tour or two. Grey Line offers a number of bus tours, including a Motorized Cable Car Tour from Union Square. If a view from the water is more to your taste, Blue & Gold Felt offers ferry tours to Alcatraz, the infamous U.S. federal penitentiary, and tours around the bay, including picturesque Sausalito. Great snapshots of Golden Gate Bridge can be taken from the ferry.

Many of the four million visitors to San Francisco don't know that you can face a big hill on one street, but a few blocks away in the same direction, the street is flat. Luckily, the city's many walking tour guides are well versed on the "easy streets" to take.

Favourite walking tours include Wok Wiz Chinatown Tours, with author, chef and historian Shirley Fong-Torres or one of her staff, and Victorian Home Walk, with Jay Gifford who is featured on NBC TV. Both guides are animated and their tours are fun and informative.

Other attractions in San Francisco include a behind the scenes tour of Pacific Bell Park, the new "old fashioned" stadium, home to baseball's San Francisco Giants; the Wax Museum at Fisherman's Wharf; and Metreon, a Sony Entertainment Centre at Yerba Buena Gardens. Metreon includes 15 state-of-the-art movie theatres, an IMAX theatre and three themed attractions surrounded by lots of shopping.

Also in Yerba Buena Gardens is an ice-skating rink, a bowling alley, an indoor hole-in-one golf course, a carousel, and for kids – Zeum, Art & Technology Centre for ages eight to 18.

The Jewish Museum San Francisco is slated to open its new home in Yerba Buena within the next few years. The mandate for the new museum, designed by Daniel Libeskind, "is to explore the Jewish tradition for contemporary relevance and meaning."

Other museums and galleries include the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art and Exploritorium, an interactive museum of science, art and human perception next to California Palace of the Legion of Honour. M.H. DeYoung Memorial Museum and neighbouring California Academy of Sciences – which has a wonderful aquarium – are both located in Golden Gate Park.

After the tours, there are still a host of evening entertainments, from stage reviews to opera and ballet. San Francisco's theatre scene is thriving. Theatrical productions of the Broadway hit Stomp; Shear Madness, a funny murder mystery; and Teatro Zinzanni, creative vaudeville under a luxurious tent, are all running indefinitely to packed houses. Not to be missed is Beach Blanket Babylon at Club Fugazi. The show, now in its 26th year, spoofs pop culture using over-the-top costumes.

Those who crave the sweet sounds of cabaret will enjoy the intimate Plush Room located in the York Hotel, formerly the Empire Hotel, where director Alfred Hitchcock filmed Vertigo in 1958. The Plush Room started life as a speakeasy in 1922, but has since cleaned up its act. Gone are the gangsters, replaced with songsters Michael Feinstein, Eartha Kitt, Dixie Carter, Maureen McGovern and Eric Comstock, to name a few.

Visit the new 'old-fashioned' stadium

Driving in San Francisco can be a nightmare, so think twice about renting a car if you plan to stay in the city. There are a number of airport transportation companies, including Lorrie's Airport Service, that offer transport to and from both San Francisco and Oakland airports. In San Francisco, there are also plenty of taxis, but to really see this city you must experience the public transit.

Invest in a San Francisco City Pass, valued at $66.50 US. for $33.25, $26.25 for seniors, and $24.25 for youths five to 17. This pass allows the holder unlimited rides for seven days on the famed cable cars and all other Muni public transportation including trains and trolleys. The package also includes tickets to six of San Francisco's most popular attractions.

For more information, contact the San Francisco Convention & Visitors Bureau at 415-974-6900, or San Francisco FastFax at 1-800-220-5747. Online: www.sfvisitor.org.

Tel Aviv Art Scene: Roni Gilat-Baharaff, an art historian with Christie's in Tel Aviv, passed through Toronto and Montreal last week in preparation for the auction house's annual sale of 19th- and 20th-century art, held in Tel Aviv each year, usually around Passover.

"I come and look at pieces in various private collections," Gilat-Baharaff explained. "Not all the people I see are interested in selling. Some just want an opinion or an appraisal."

Gilat-Baharaff, who earned an art degree at Tel Aviv University and another from the famed Courtauld Institute of Art in London, often gives both. She's always on the lookout for good pieces to accept on consignment for the sale, which Christie's has held annually since 1994.

The sale usually includes 19th- and early 20th-century views of the Holy Land by visiting artists, noteworthy Judaica paintings, art from the school of Paris, and modern and contemporary Israeli art.

"We find a lot of consignments in the States and in Europe," she said. "Many things sell better in Israel than anywhere else. The collectors come to Israel or live in Israel... It's a very active art market and a very strong market. Prices for high-quality Israeli art have gone up considerably in the last few years." Asthma drug doesn't stunt growth

TORONTO – A 10-year study has found that budesonide, an inhaled corticosteroid used to treat asthma, does not stunt children's growth.

The findings, part of an ongoing study being conducted by Lone Agertoft, of the Kolding Hospital in Denmark, and Soren Pederson of the University of Southern Denmark, were reported in a recent issue of the New England Journal of Medicine.

Since impaired growth is one of the common potential side effects of taking steroidal inhalers, many people hesitate to give them to children, said Meyer Balter, director of the asthma education clinic at Mount Sinai Hospital and associate professor of medicine at the University of Toronto.

Asthma, he told The CJN, is a disease of the smooth muscles surrounding the breathing tubes, leading to wheezing, cough, shortness of breath. Inflammation or swelling of the air passages sends the muscles into spasm.

The disease is increasing in western industrial societies, Balter said. Contrary to popular belief, he said, probably the least important cause is pollution.

"When East and West Germany united after the fall of the Berlin Wall, it was found that there was far less asthma in the East German population, even though Communist countries had virtually no pollution standards."

The explanation is probably that there are more indoor allergens, both natural and chemical, in western countries, and those living there tend to spend more time indoors. Also, Balter said, there are more pets, whose dander and hair are likely to cause inflammation.

While there are pills for asthma, the treatment of choice is corticosteroids, drugs which treat the inflammation. They are inhaled through puffers, which send the medication directly to the air passages.

The study showed that, at least with budesonide, the youngsters reached their predicted height. In fact, some surpassed it, perhaps, Balter said, because of their improved health.

This particular study is ongoing, and is expected to look at other inhaled asthma drugs. – L.S.

Retiree wards off vision impairment

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. William (Bill) Goodman, 79, a retired ear, nose and throat specialist, has not let age-related macular degeneration interfere with his normal life.

"Macular degeneration, for which there is no known cure, affects the ability to focus, or central vision, but it does not affect peripheral vision," Goodman said.

Goodman has filled his home with vision aids that enable him to watch TV, attend movies, surf the Internet, or read a newspaper.

His impairment started two years ago when a red blotch blocked the central vision in one eye when he woke up in Ann Arbor, Mich., where he was attending the bar mitzvah of a friend's son.

Six months later, his other eye was affected and that's when he started his own research on vision aids.

Among the resources he tapped was the Toronto Reference Library downtown which has a special section for those with hearing or vision problems. There he found a catalogue of vision-related aids that had some of the things he was looking for. Another resource which helped him was an optometrist-sponsored low vision centre in Scarborough.

He knew that binoculars provided magnification, as did the surgical glasses he used in his own practice.

But holding up binoculars for any length of time was hard on the arms, so he went looking for the equivalent of opera glasses which were mounted like spectacles. He finally came across what he wanted in the reference library catalogue.

Goodman uses spectacle mounted binoculars (they work like opera glasses) to read street signs when he is driving in the daytime, but has voluntarily given up driving at night in the city or on highways.

He uses these so-called opera glasses to watch TV or movies.

His closed-circuit TV gadget with magnification aids enables him to blow up newspaper print so that he can read it, though it takes him three times as long to read a newspaper because the TV gadget does not allow him to scan a page as he ordinarily would.

He has cut his book reading by two-thirds since his vision deteriorated.

In the third-floor office of his home is a 21-inch computer screen, with magnification potential, which enables him to surf the Internet.

Through it, he has joined the Macular Degeneration Partnership, a U.S.-based group, which sends him a newsletter every two weeks with useful information.

The Ontario government, through its assistive devices program, pays a good portion of the cost of these vision aids, he said.

"I'm surprised that the big optical companies have not got into the act as there is such a big market out there."

Goodman is critical of the media which feature experimental medical advances that have not been thoroughly tested and thereby give false hope.

It will take many years of research – "not in my lifetime" – to come up with a cure, he said.

What he has learned through his own research he is willing to pass on to others because he believes the disease which has altered his vision affects 30 percent of those over 70, to one degree or another, and this means 13 million people in United States suffer from it.

Election 2000

Liberal victory likely: pundit

give the government a message, knowing that the vast majority of members are also liberals with a capital and a small "c."

In the meantime, Alliance leader Stockwell Day, desperately needing votes in Ontario, appeared in the demographic heart of the Toronto Jewish community to condemn the Liberal action at the UN.

While this has obviously appealed to members of the community, it is unlikely to translate into the voter support that the Alliance needs to make inroads in the Toronto Jewish community, largely because the electors are not inclined to vote solely on the basis of that one issue, however much it goes to the core of Jewish identity.

Were these actions to be repeated by the government, the impact might be greater, but in the meantime, Canadian Jewry is more inclined to work from within the government than from outside of it.

By consequence, electorally based threats may serve to reduce the perceived influence over the community and thus the political credibility of those who issue them.

After this election, there will be a serious need to reflect upon the strategy to be adopted when approaching the government as well as the opposition parties regarding policies on the Middle East.

The Jewish community will have to give even greater consideration to the changing demographics in Canada and the continued polarization of the electorate as they approach the country's decision-makers.

Jack Jedwab is executive director of the Association for Canadian Studies in Montreal.

Security concerns affect Metulla's Canada Centre

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The silver-medal finish by ice dancers Sergei Sakhnovsky and Galit Chait at Skate Canada is a pretty good indication that elite sports programs at Canada Centre in Metulla are doing well.

The flip side of that coin is a different matter. Thanks to the uncertain security situation in Israel, the Centre's recreational programs are languishing.

Ever since the military pull-back from Lebanon, "Canada Centre has been having problems," acknowledged Yossi Goldberg, a board member of Canada Centre and former mayor of Metulla. "The public has stopped travelling across the country."

Goldberg, who also serves as head of the Association for Winter Sports in Israel, was in the Toronto area recently as head of the Israeli delegation to Skate Canada.

"Generally, it's quiet," he told The CJN. "But psychologically, it's bad. Citizens are afraid to visit the north."

The result has been a major revenue shortfall for Canada Centre – $1 million U.S. so far and counting. The government has compensated the Centre to some extent, said Goldberg, who served as Metulla's mayor for 20 years.

Despite the security concerns, Skate Israel, a major international meet now in its fifth year, has not been affected. "We have more requests for invitations than we can accommodate," Goldberg said of the December event. "It's become so popular that everyone wants to be in the competition."

Goldberg believes that despite current woes, the future of the north remains bright.

"Life along all the border is normal. We haven't had any attacks. Mostly it's quiet but you're under a threat that maybe it will change."

Goldberg believes northerners must work to change the region's image before visitors will return. Metulla did so before, in the 1970s and early '80s, when the security situation was much worse. In the 1970s, the north experienced numerous terrorist attacks and in July 1981, hundreds of katyusha rockets pounded Metulla over 10 consecutive days, he said.

Prior to the Lebanon withdrawal and the Palestinian intifadah, Canada Centre was a bustling vacation destination for Israelis from across the country. While Goldberg is hoping for a return to those glory days, in the meantime he is seeking financial support from Canadian friends, who helped build Canada Centre. Running an elite athletic program is expensive and for Israel to have a realistic shot at a medal about $200,000 U.S. will be needed, he said.

For Goldberg, Salt Lake City in 2002 is front and centre of just about everything he does these days. He can already foresee the contours of the Israeli team he will lead to the winter games: an ice-dance duo, perhaps one or two singles skaters and maybe a short-track speed skating team. As many as five athletes altogether, if all goes according to plan.

A medal hunt will likely depend on the performance of Sakhnovsky and Chait, whose second place finish at Skate Canada came on the heels of a third in Skate America.

An Olympic medal would certainly grab the attention of the soccer and basketball-mad Israeli public.

Goldberg proudly points to Canada Centre's ice-rink as the reason Israel can even contemplate a winter games medal.

"Without Canada Centre, there would be no chance to develop winter sports in Israel," Goldberg said.

Speed skaters in Canada Centre are coached by Boris Drabkin and Georg Zaslavsky, two ex-Russians who bring a wealth of experience, he said.

Two young athletes, Dennis Zaslavsky and Olga Danilov, are Israel's best hopes in short track. Danilov was ranked fourth in Europe last year while Zaslavsky was sixth.

Michael "Misha" Shmerkin is still Israel's top male figure skater while a sabra, Daria Zuravicki, who trains in the United States, is the country's best female singles skater.

Taking 'stock' of our issues

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

A year ago, would anyone have thought that Jewish voters would even consider, let alone embrace, a leader and political party cut from the same cloth as the hellfire Prairie populists who once scared the daylights out of us?

Score one for Stockwell Day, a Socred buffed and retooled for 2000: he's pulled off a miracle when it's come to courting the Jewish vote. He's been masterful at exploiting our rage at the Liberals, deft at deflecting our anger at his friend Mike Harris, who is ultimately responsible for Jewish day school funding and has tapped into every dark sentiment we may have about abortion, homosexuality and capital punishment.

Recently, CBC television personality Ralph Benmergui, with camera in tow, journeyed to Wolfie's Deli at Bathurst and Sheppard to take the pulse of Jewish voters. After hearing the usual litany of complaints about Canada's dastardly deed at the UN and the public's refusal to help defray costs at Ontario's private schools, the exasperated host pronounced: "I haven't heard a thing about health care or taxes or education."

Are Jewish voters ready to cast their ballots based on one or two narrow, parochial issues? Don't our religious values compel us to express concern for, and alleviate the plight of, "the widow and the orphan," i.e., the stranger, the needy and the hungry? Are we so ready to abandon those values because we're mad at some ignorant vote in New York (taken by the same body we laud for saying we're being discriminated against when it comes to school funding), that we embrace a man and party whose philosophical underpinnings are baldly anathema to us?

Apparently. As several recent well-attended rallies have shown, the Alliance is being cheered in the so-called Jewish ridings. But then, little else stirs the average voter from his torpor than one issue that sticks in his craw. Barry Campbell, a Jewish former MP, tells me that when he was in office, constituents would routinely ask him how he felt about a single issue (often, abortion). If his response displeased, they would promptly leave.

Day's success in courting the Jewish vote has been nothing short of machiavellian. He pounced on the UN vote like a cat, saying his support for the Jewish state is a matter of principle, not politics. Also a matter of principle, we should know, is the following: Day believes the Earth is 6,000 years old, that Adam and Eve were real people, that humans and dinosaurs co-existed, and, as an evangelical Christian, that anyone who has not accepted Jesus into his or her heart is going straight to hell. That means you and me.

I believe Stockwell Day is not remotely anti-Semitic. But I also know that as the administrator, in the early 1980s, of the Christian Bentley Centre, a private Pentecostal school in Alberta, he vigorously defended the Accelerated Christian Education (ACE) curriculum, which asked students whether it was true or false that Jews are "children of their father, the devil." (To be fair, there's no evidence the curriculum was ever used at Day's school.) And although I know Day has no control over who endorses him, how would you like to be praised by Jim Keegstra and Doug Christie, lawyer to every Holocaust denier ever prosecuted in Canada? When I recently asked Robert Goldin, the Alliance candidate in Thornhill, how Jews can feel comfortable in that company, he responded that Christie joined the party in order to embarrass it. As explanations go, that's as lame as they get.

These are strange political times. In Canada, they have produced strange bedfellows indeed.

YUMMY EGG ROLLS

Egg Roll Skins: Use your favourite blintz recipe.

Filling:

2 cups coarsely chopped zucchini
1/4 cup chopped onion
1 cup sliced mushrooms
1 cup chopped cabbage handful of fresh bean sprouts cooking spray
1 tsp. soy sauce
black pepper to taste
sugar to taste

Sauté zucchini, onion, mushrooms, cabbage, and bean sprouts in a large skillet over med. heat for 4-6 mins. Stir in soy sauce, pepper and sugar to taste. Take 1 blintz leaf at a time and place on a flat surface. Spread 2 tblsp. of filling on leaf in a mound, leaving 1/2" border. Fold top over filling, then fold both sides over filling. Roll up like a jelly roll, seam side down. Heat large heavy skillet over med.-high heat. When pan is hot, coat with cooking spray, and carefully place egg rolls in skillet. Fry till crisp or bake in oven at 350°F until lightly browned. Drain on paper towels.

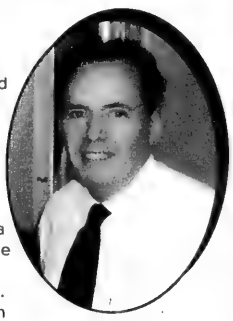
Dedicated Divisions Build Campaign Success

The hard work of UJA FEDERATION campaign divisions is propelling Campaign 2001 – The Campaign For Our Children ever closer to its fundraising goal of $45 million.

The campaign total tops $33 million – with nearly four million additional dollars over this time last year. All increased contributions will be allocated to initiatives that assist children at risk and bring young people closer to Jewish life.

Gift increases from the Finance and Technology Division, chaired by Barry Tissenbaum, have reached 21% - well above the record 13% average across the campaign.



Barry Tissenbaum

"Our industry is doing well and our members understand that we have an obligation to commit to a higher level of increase, one that reflects our financial success," said Tissenbaum.

Another leading division is the Young Leadership Cabinet which recently held a telethon. Thirty members came out to Call For Kids and their efforts raised $3,400 from 51 donors – 44 of whom had never made a campaign gift. "Peers canvassing peers not only achieves greater results," noted Sabrina Kerbel, who co-chairs the division with David Beron, "it builds connections for the future."

The voice of women continues to be clearly heard as both the Lion of Judah and Ruby Divisions of Women's Campaign & Advocacy achieve exceptional increases this year. "In addition, there has been significant growth in our Pomegranate Division, which consists of women who give $1,800 in their own name," said Women's Campaign & Advocacy Chair Dodi Weill. "The cause is so compelling - our children - that we can canvass with complete conviction and our results reflect that."

Neil Nisker, who along with David Koschitzky co-chairs Top Gifts, is encouraged by the enthusiastic response to Campaign 2001. "When I speak with our generous donors about their annual gift, the supportive and reciprocal relationship which emerges never ceases to amaze me. We thank each other for the honour of participating in this community," said Nisker.

Lawyers and Accountants Division Co-Chairs Jeff Blidner and Eric Slavens also report exciting results. "Our canvassers' energy and commitment is echoed by the donor response they are generating - all of which is strengthening The Campaign For Our Children."

Two other campaign trailblazers, the Goods and Services Division and Real Estate Cabinet, have been busy organizing innovative special events, in addition to hitting record highs in their donor canvasses. Last week's successful Real Estate Cabinet program on the growing investment relationship between Israel and Canada attracted 300 participants. On November 23, the Goods and Services Division, in cooperation with the Entertainment and Marketing Division, will be featuring a tour of the award-winning Umbra home accessories facility.

The Israelis are Coming... The Canadians Have Landed

A sold-out crowd of 300 was on hand to hear international experts Chaim Katzman from Israel and Toronto's Robert Eli Rubinstein discuss "Global Real Estate in the New Millennium," a program sponsored by the Real Estate Cabinet of UJA FEDERATION.

Correction

In the UJA FEDERATION ad "As One Community" on October 19, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein was mistakenly identified as President of Kolel. In fact, Rabbi Goldstein is President of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, which supports Campaign 2001 - The Campaign For Our Children.

Important Partnership Trip

Two weeks after returning from a solidarity trip to Israel, members of UJA FEDERATION's Partnership 2000 (P2K)/Project Renewal Committee are still overwhelmed by the warmth with which they were received.

The UJA FEDERATION contingent travelled to Eilat/Eilot, Israel's Partnership region and to the communities of Kfar Gvirol and Kiryat Moshe, which UJA FEDERATION is assisting.

"People across the country, even those removed from the conflict, thanked us for our visit at a time when support from the global Jewish community is so needed, " said Committee Chair Warren Kimel.

Since its inception in 1994, P2K has been involved in establishing "living bridges" that connect members of the Toronto community with Israelis in Eilat/Eilot, in order to share skills, leadership and resources.

These children were among many who welcomed Partnership 2000 mission members.

Live bands for your party

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A live band gives a party an air of elegance, says Kory Livingstone of the Kory Livingstone Band (905-669-0728).

Livingstone, who plays the piano and sings with his five-piece band that includes a saxophone, drums, guitar and bass, says that a band entertains the guests. "They can watch us even if they are not dancing.

"They also enjoy talking with the band members. People are social animals; they crave other people. A band plays music, and entertains on a human level."

Anyone can play records, he says, but a band adds personality to a song. "We can determine what type of music the people want, and play different renditions of a tune accordingly.

"We can't please all the people all the time, but we can cover as many bases as possible. We even work together with DJs in order to give the party a perfect mix. Both the kids and the grandparents are happy," says Livingstone.

Matt Pines of the Matt Pines Band (416-234-5500), a seven piece band that includes three singers, keyboard, drums, two saxes and a trumpet, compares having a disc jockey and a band at a simchah to the difference between having a hot dog and a steak dinner.

"Disc jockeys use props and act silly; the kids love it. A band is also fun, but it is elegant and sophisticated; it is for people who want grown-up entertainment."

A good band is versatile, he says. "You cannot come to a wedding and only play the blues. You have to play for all people, for all ages. Europeans, for example, may want a waltz or a rumba. Bands have to give each group its own time."

Kory Livingstone

Rena Gaile of the Rena Gaile Band (905-420-8625) has a seven or eight piece band, but specializes in music for the dinner or cocktail hour of a party, a house party, or one at a small venue. "It adds a lot of class. The music is there, but it is intimate; it fades into the background. It is not so loud that it gets in the way."

If clients want a little more music, she will build on the duo, and add such instruments as a string bass or a drum. "That's about as big as you would want to get for a small house party."

Proper equipment is essential in order for the music to sound great, says Livingstone. "Band members need to be able to adjust the music to the proper level – it cannot be too loud or not loud enough."

Bands also need to be versatile and work with a budget, he says. "We can work within a budget by adding or taking away pieces of a band. It will still sound good, and the clients are satisfied."

Live bands for your party

Pines prefers clients to book the band about a year in advance and to get references. "Ask people who have had an event and make sure the band knows how to handle situations particular to a Jewish wedding or large party."

Clients need to trust the band to a certain extent, with respect to what music to play. "We need to see what is in the room, and what is making them get up and dance. Experience is very important. Bands have to know how to handle the crowd.

"Talent is essential, but bands must have experience playing in the type of party you are having.

"It is also important to make sure that the band members dress properly for the event. They should not come informally to a black-tie party."

The band should meet with the bride and groom several times, especially about three weeks before the date, to plan strategy and finalize details. "We will even provide free piano rehearsal time for any guest who wishes to perform with the band that night," says Pines.

People remember the music, says Livingstone. "That is one of the first things they think about when they think about the party. Music can make it either successful or unsuccessful.

"Even if it is only a piano in the background, guests get into a party mood. They may not even realize it is the music that is relaxing them. Music is romance, and we sell romance."

Sweeten your party

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Everyone has a sweet tooth; and where better to indulge it than a party?

Bev Kruger of The Chocolate Moose (416-784-9092) and Julie Greenspoon of Suckers Candy Co. (416-405-8946) have a wealth of products to tempt you.

Chocolate Moose, says Kruger, sells only the finest Belgian chocolate. Their products are kosher, both pareve and cholov Israel dairy. Here you'll find chocolate truffles, chocolate-dipped dried and glazed fruit, and the peanut brittle and nougat they're famous for.

Kruger enjoys her business, because people coming to buy gifts are in a pleasant frame of mind. There's medical evidence, she adds, that pareve chocolate is good for you – relaxing you and enhancing your well-being.

Chocolate Moose does custom work, freehand figurines, centrepieces and smash cakes; their creations include Torah scrolls, cartoon characters, chocolate cornucopias, urns and baskets. While most of their work is made with molds, they also do some shaping with hand tools.

For those who don't get to many kids' parties, a smash cake is a hollow, decorated cake-shaped shell. The guest of honour, say, the bar or bat mitzvah, smashes it, then other kids run up and grab the pieces.

Gift baskets can also be found at the Chocolate Moose; so can hostess gifts for out-of-town guests, which can be delivered to hotels. They also sell giftware, which they can fill with chocolate.

For large orders or complex creative work, Kruger recommends coming a few weeks, even a month ahead. Not that creative work takes that long; but she needs to organize her time. Also, planning ahead makes sure you get popular items without risking that they'll be snapped up.

If Bev Kruger is a chocolate specialist, Julie Greenspoon is a Renaissance woman of candy.

One of Suckers' specialties is loot bags. Inexpensive and fun, they can be made to your specifications, and may include small toys. You can mix and match candies – separating M&Ms by colour, for instance, so you can have blue and white for a bar mitzvah.

The words "well-stocked" are an understatement. You might expect a big chocolate bar and lollipop selection, Mövenpick ice cream at the Danforth store, or cotton-candy machines at the Danforth and Beaches stores; but what about one-kilogram Chupa Chup lollipops?

"Everyone," in Greenspoon's experience, "has some kind of candy memory." Evoking these memories, Suckers stores play candy commercials, old and new. Attuned to the comeback of a favourite many people recall from their teens, they have, not just Pez counters, but entire walls with every possible kind of Pez.

Suckers nostalgia bags conjure up memories, too. They may include Neco wafers, sponge toffee, old-fashioned licorice strings, Mackintosh toffee in the plaid box, Whopper malted chocolate balls, jawbreakers, gum balls, and Thrills gum.

While children are the obvious customers, the combination of fond memories and a sweet tooth draws many adults. Suckers also carries some non-edible nostalgia items like Barbie doll and Etch-A-Sketch key chains.

Adults don't only come for candy. Like the kids, they go to the bouncing ball section of the stores; they bounce the balls, and ride scooters around the store the way their children do.

Ketubot are works of art

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The ketubah or marriage certificate may be a legal document, but it can also be a work of art.

These days, many young couples are getting custom-designed ketubot to commemorate their marriage ceremonies, while older couples are commissioning ketubot to mark special anniversaries.

Calligrapher and artist Karny Rivlin Vorona creates ketubot as well as other kinds of original art. "Doing originals – it's very personalized and different from a print," she said. "It's a unique one-of-a-kind piece of artwork done to mark the occasion."

You work closely with the people who commission the ketubah, she explained.

There are different way of getting ideas for the ketubah, she said. "Sometimes customers will look through books of old ketubot. I never copy anybody else's. I do my own. You can get ideas from different sources. You can travel outside and look at nature and get different ideas."

Rivlin Vorona said that in addition to choosing the actual images and symbols to be portrayed, customers also have to decide on whether they want a symmetrical or asymmetrical structure; a traditional or modern design; and multi-coloured or subdued tones.

She said the images she is often asked to incorporate into her work include depictions of Jerusalem, flowers, and the shivat haminim (the seven species), wine cups, challot and Shabbat candles. "It's entirely up to the individual, which is what gives each piece its uniqueness."

A customized ketubah enables the couple to gear the text of the ketubah to their particular stream of Judaism, Rivlin Vorona said. "We have so many streams. Each stream uses its own text."

Couples can incorporate those things that are meaningful for them – a poem or a song, she said.

She has her own technique for creating the ketubot, which are mixed media. "I use, mostly gouache [a type of watercolour], shell-gold, gold leaf – 23.5 or 24 karat gold.

"What's really unique in the art is that I mostly write the text in colour, not in black… I don't use ink. I like the thickness and texture of the paint on paper. Ink is very flat. You can feel the ridges of the letter with paint."

Born in Israel, Rivlin Vorona began her art career in interior house, theatre, architectural, graphic design and city planning.

She and her husband spent five years in Curacao before immigrating to Canada with their two children 23 years ago.

Rivlin Vorona studied calligraphy and illumination in Canada. "I took courses with some of the greatest calligraphers in the world, here and in the United States… I applied what learned from English to the Hebrew."

Kids' party ideas – no matter what their interest

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Jodi Cohen and Charlene Goldfarb, who both have a background in entertainment, catering, children's parties and event planning, decided to pool their talent and set up their own event and party planning company.

About a year ago, they founded Bash Productions, www.bashproductions.com, an event planning company for adult parties, which also has a children's division called Bash for Kids.

The two women bring years of experience to event planning, said Cohen (416-727-5971), who spent many years working for her mother's catering business before enrolling in a college certification program for event planning, and conference management.

"My first catering job was on my 12th birthday," she said.

She said her background complements Goldfarb's (416-518-9585) experience in co-ordinating parties and other simchahs, corporate events and birthday parties.

"She gets the calls for the kids' stuff. She was known for doing the kids' parties. She's phenomenal with children. I was more behind the scenes or I worked as a chef in the kitchen."

Cohen said the motto of Bash Productions is: "We dare you to find something we can't do. We get phone calls that put that slogan to the test."

'Downstairs is a replica of the Montreal Canadiens' dressing room'

She said Bash for Kids specializes in parties for children aged four to 12. "We do a lot of research. We'll get as close to the schools as we can. We'll go into the playgrounds. We'll go into the toy stores. We watch kid shows.

"We're not the same as other companies. We like to be original. We like to be set on a different level."

Cohen praised Goldfarb's ability with children. She said she was very proud of a recent Halloween party Bash for Kids organized at a local elementary school.

"We did an interactive dance party. We brought in a sound system. The kids loved it. We had four-year-olds jumping up and down until 9 o'clock."

She said for interactive dance parties you hire dancers and arrange age-appropriate games. "We design the program for the age group."

The children's birthday parties can be held at home or in a community centre, said Goldfarb. "If you'd like us to find a venue, we'll do it."

She noted that some of the elements she has introduced into a birthday party have included "anything from games and contests to makeup, hair and henna."

She said boys like the scientist birthday parties. The scientists "show you the difference between magic and science. We have people who do it for us."

Creative body art is also popular with boys, she said, explaining that the artists use free-hand to create the design the child asks for.

Body sparkles is another product children like, she said. "It's like henna. It stays on the skin from a couple of days up to a week. It's an adhesive. It's safe. It's not harmful to the skin."

Theme parties are also part of Bash for Kids repertoire, Goldfarb said.

"If you want to have a theme, we'll put together a party based on that theme. We do packages. We'll provide everything. We do custom packages to suit the client's needs."

Nail polish and beauty session parties can start as young as kindergarten, she said. "You can do arts and crafts. There are so many things out there."

Interactive games with hula hoops are also very popular, Goldfarb said. "Everything we do is interactive. Our staff is always outgoing and willing to do anything."

Peter and Paul's caters to all your party needs

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Imagine an outdoor garden wedding ceremony overlooking a pond on the grounds of a Tudor-style country manor.

Welcome to the Manor, an elegant banquet hall located at 16750 Weston Rd. in King City.

The three-storey 32,000-square-foot facility, which can accommodate between 800 and 850 people, overlooks a six-acre pond on 120 acres of grounds of Carrying Place Golf and Country Club.

Or perhaps you're looking for a lavish European-style banquet facility to hold a party for 800 guests.

Bellagio, at 8540 Jane St. in Vaughan, with its state-of-the-art audio- visual equipment, is an ideal venue for corporate parties, weddings and bar/bat mitzvahs, says owner Peter Eliopoulos. "Bellagio has been designed to take you and your guests to another place and to another time."

Eliopoulos is also the owner of Peter and Paul's (416-410-0677, www.bypeterandpauls.com), a large multi-faceted entertainment and hospitality company based in 28,000-square- foot premises in Woodbridge.

In addition to running two banquet facilities with catering and decorating divisions, Peter and Paul's runs Sound Sensations (a fully interactive DJ entertainment company), a video and photography company, as well as a basket and gift company.

If you're planning an event, Peter and Paul's can attend to all your party needs, says Eliopoulos. " We offer one-stop shopping for DJ, photography and decorating... Every occasion will be accommodated with our special touch."

People who are planning a simchah can arrange for kosher catering, he says. "We do a lot of Jewish weddings."

Eliopoulos started in the hospitality business 18 years ago. He had a restaurant at Keele and Steeles and he began catering parties. When the small parties grew, he purchased a banquet hall. He opened up the Manor five years ago and Bellagio last year.

Eliopoulos notes that Peter and Paul's Baskets and Gifts is one of the largest basket and gift companies in the GTA. "When it's time to give a special gift, Peter and Paul's offers an extensive variety of distinctive baskets and gifts for every holiday and special occasion."

Feed your guests with food — glorious food

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Deanna Schaffer, owner of Malmar Catering and Tastefully Yours, has been in the catering business for more than 30 years, running Malmar (416-638-0091) with her husband Tom Schaffer until his death 2½ years ago.

Trained as a chef in Israel, Tom worked in hotels and on Israeli cruise ships, Schaffer says. "He wanted an immediate relationship with the clientele, so he went into kosher catering when he came here."

The first synagogue he worked at was Beth Sholom, where the company had a 17-year association. Now Malmar is the caterer for Beth Tikvah and Shaar Shalom synagogues.

The couple met in Toronto, Schaffer says. "[Tom] had already immigrated to Canada. We met by accident. I came here [from England] on vacation. I went back engaged."

Schaffer says she was always interested in food. "As we were a team with everything else, we became a team with this."

Malmar caters small house parties and large simchahs for hundreds of people, Schaffer says. "When you serve a large amount, the food has to be as wonderful for the last person as the first... In a house party, you serve up a little at a time."

One of the most popular dishes Malmar serves is Chicken Parisienne, a breast of chicken in apricot ginger sauce, she says. "We've had it in our repertoire forever. Every time we take it out, the clients want it back."

Oriental noodles is a popular side dish, but mashed potatoes are very much in vogue, Schaffer says, noting that two-coloured mashed potatoes —white and sweet — are often served together.

While Schaffer says she can't quote specific prices for meals because some of the cost is determined by the individual synagogues, she does say she offers her clientele a "Simchah Special," which starts at $75. The package includes a full bar, hot and cold hors-d'oeuvres, the main course, a full sweet table with fruit, as well as the cost of linen rental, staff and taxes.

"We're known not only for our presentation, but for the sustained quality of the food and service. There's always plenty to eat. Everybody's happy and satisfied... We give seconds. It's never a problem."

Schaffer says that chicken is the most popular main course item. "We hardly ever serve beef. As a second choice, people will have veal or fish.

"As for appetizers, people still enjoy hot and cold hors-d'oeuvres, but they don't want much fried food," Schaffer says."They're more conscious of health. They'll only have one item that's fried.

"Food made with phyllo dough is very popular, as are kabobs, grilled or barbecued, and grilled vegetables."

Although Malmar makes many specialized desserts, Schaffer says people want more finger pastries and little cookies for the sweet table. "People don't want a big piece of something. They would rather have a little of everything."

Another new trend is lunch instead of evening weddings, Schaffer says. "Some people opt for more guests and different kinds of food — smaller meals or a buffet."

When people plan their event with Malmar, they meet with Schaffer herself. "I set the menu. I meet with clients more than once. I'm very flexible and accessible."

PARTY PLANNER

Planning a party on the Web

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If you want to plan a party or a simchah and you're not sure where to start, you may want to visit an online party/event Web site.

Two companies that may be of interest are TorontoPartyGuide.com and EventTips.com.

Band leader and event planner Rick Levine set up the Web site, www.torontopartyguide.com a year ago.

"We were the first company to launch an Internet site in the Toronto area to help the public plan weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs," said Levine.

"This site lists hundreds of services and products that can help make a person's party planning venture a pleasure. All they have to do is to get on the Internet and visit our site."

Levine has an extensive background in party entertainment as the leader/singer of the Rick Levine Band. He also runs an interactive DJ company, Times Square Entertainment, and for the last 10 years he's been co-producing a biannual party/event planning trade show – We're Having a Party.

The new Internet site, www.torontopartyguide.com, is not a site for making money, Levine said. "We're not there to make a profit."

He said the site is about providing a free service to the community and an opportunity to promote the services and products of the the party planning show's 70 exhibitors – photographers, florists, videographers, caterers, DJs and bands.

They are listed on the site and there is also a subsite for vendors outside the show, which takes place Jan. 30, 6 to 10 p.m. at Le Parc Banquet Hall in Markham, he said.

The opening page of TorontoPartyGuide.com

"We usually get about 2,000 visitors."

The party show offers live demos and the opportunity to talk to the exhibitors, Levine said. "There's nothing that replaces coming out to the show, hearing bands, meeting the people, tasting the food."

However, he said the Internet site affords people the opportunity to shop anonymously before making any decision, he said. "They can gather all their information before having to make any decisions.

"They can download sound clips, video clips of DJs. We also provide links to other party planner sites …

"We are posting photos of recent shows as well. People can download

Kids' party ideas – no matter what their interest

She said she gets tremendous satisfaction working with children. "For as long as I live I'll be working with kids. It's makes us happy to see them happy. We're there to put a smile on the kids' faces."

The Hockey Hall of Fame is another popular children's party venue. Rebecca Yurman, group sales co-ordinator (416-360-7735) said the hall became more accessible to the public seven years ago when it moved from the CNE grounds to BCE Place, 10 Front St. at the corner of Yonge and Front streets.

The Hockey Hall of Fame offers many displays, exhibits and interactive exhibits for children, Yurman said, including hockey videos and a half-hour hockey movie.

Children can go on a self-guided tour to see all the NHL trophies, including the Stanley Cup. The interactive games are also a big attraction for young Wayne Gretzky wannabes.

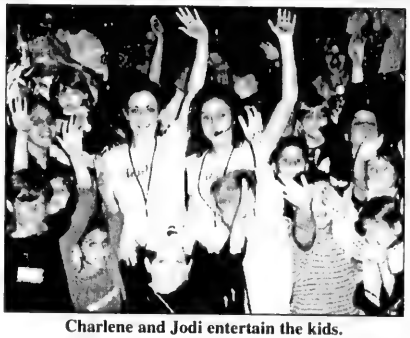
In NHL Full Impact Hockey, the only game that costs extra to play ($2), the child dons goalie equipment and has to stop the pucks.

For MacDonald's Shoot, the participant must try to score against five goalies, Yurman explained. "You have to hit the target. The game measures your velocity, speed and accuracy.

"In Shut Out, you're the goalie in a virtual reality game."

The TSN Broadcast Zone allows the participant to anchor at TSN's Sportsdesk and call the play by play of some of hockey's greatest goals, she said. "You broadcast a famous hockey goal or a segment from the TSN Sportsdesk."

The Bell Great Hall houses the Stanley Cup, the trophies and plaques, pictures and inscriptions of every inducted member of the hall of fame. Downstairs is a replica of the Montreal Canadiens' dressing room.



Charlene and Jodi entertain the kids.

The World of Hockey permanent exhibit contains all kinds of hockey artifacts – old hockey jerseys, sticks, skates, pictures, Yurman said. "The things have been donated." The zone also features IBM's interactive exhibit – Global Game Encounter.

However, she noted that the big attraction until April 2001 is the Gretzky exhibit, titled, Wayne Gretzky, the Legend. The exhibit includes an audio/ visual presentation, pictures, rare memorabilia, and personal artifacts – even his lunch pail is on display.

The Hockey Hall of Fame offers a special admission rate for groups of more than 15 people. The cost for general admission for youth four to 18 is $8 and $6 as part of a group rate. Party packages with food are also available.

Plan to spend about two hours at the exhibit. To receive the group rate, you have to book a week ahead. The Hockey Hall of Fame offers extended hours during holidays. To find out about the hours of operation or general information, call 416-360-7765.

Planning a party on the Web

sound clips and videos directly from our Internet site from the various vendors that they're interested in. "Most of them are well-known with solid reputations."

Visitors to the site can receive event planning tips, suggestions for candlelighting songs, a sample agenda, sample speeches and party planning advice, Levine said.

"It's all free. All we ask is that [visitors] support our vendors."

Levine said the site, which was created by Infinity Web Design, is also connected to a variety of sites that offer promotions and give-aways. "We're also developing a live chat, and an interactive search engine."

Visitors to the site can also access a large American party warehouse site where they can order glow sticks and other give-aways, as well as decorating items, directly online at wholesale prices, he said.

"When you combine the convenience of our Internet site with the live show that we produce twice a year, people can really get moving quickly on planning their function."

Another new party/event planning Internet site, www.eventtips.com, was started by DJ, Lowell Brown

"I've been a disc jockey for about eight years. I thought about doing it about two years ago… when I was meeting clients.

"A lot of people don't know what they're doing and they had a lot of questions. I wanted to provide people with tips and resources to help them plan events."

The site has been up and running since the beginning of August.

There are four separate sections on the site – corporate, birthday parties, bar/bat mitzvahs and wedding tips.

"We provide tips, articles and information on all areas of party planning," Brown said.

"I have 132 items in my tips archives and a vendor directory of 900 listings."

For example in the birthday party section he provides listings for clowns, loot bags and party ideas and in the bar mitzvah section Brown offers suggestions for candlelighting songs.

There are five companies that have signed up as members; they get their own Web page, a message board and banner advertising on the site.

Brown likened EventTips.com to an online trade show: visitors can see all the services, find information, connect with professionals.

"I'm providing a way for these companies to market their services in a brand new way.

"The Internet has a lot of potential for people to interact with others, to share stories and information and form relationships."

EventTips.com is a medium for promoting people's products, while offering a service to those people planning a party or event, Brown said.

Members get banner ads and message board discussion areas. They can ask questions and [have] a way to connect to future customers.

And while there are 900 listings in the directory, it's the members who get priority listing, he said.

The site is growing every month, according to Brown. "We get 100 hits per day on average. In the month of October, we had 4,000 hits."

Another Web site is: Up & Coming Events, 905-886-8148.

Make decor a priority for your party

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When people plan a party, decor isn't always their priority, but people should never underestimate its impact. Upon entering a room, as Jack Schnoll of Kosher 'n' Natural (416-789-7173) points out, the first thing you see is the decor.

Vibrant colours and visual contrasts strike you even before you register spatial relationships. Step into a hall with a lit chandelier and your eyes are drawn first to those glowing points of light. Only then do you notice the height of the ceiling. That's the kind of effect your decor should have.

Decor can make an older hall feel contemporary, replacing sombre tones with cheery brightness, give a neutral setting the ambience of life or make a pleasant setting spectacular. Choose a decorator who will create these images for you.

A conscientious professional knows the field and anything which touches upon it. This often involves formal study along with practical experience. For example, Martha Reesor of Entertaining Xtras (905-882-4835) is a member of the American Institute of Floral Designers and has studied both in Canada and Holland.

Choose someone who will help make your celebration unique. Every good decorator has special talents: one of Kosher 'n' Natural's is candy tree centrepieces. Reesor, who calls herself a "special event decorator," likewise sets out to "transform an ordinary space into an extraordinary experience."

Reesor recommends booking three or four months ahead, earlier if possible; she's already booked into 2002. Secure your venue first, though: she can't beautify it without knowing how it looks.

Select someone who works closely with other party professionals, she urges — someone who makes the effort to learn everything pertinent, such as who your guests are. A competent professional tailors the work to your needs, including your budget, and will work in any venue, be it hall, hotel, synagogue or home.

First look through a decorator's portfolio and view his or her samples. Once you've done this, Reesor points out, it's easier to make sure the decorator knows what you like, and can adapt to it.

A good professional is systematic. Reesor uses her first meeting to get acquainted, go over relevant information and discover what you want. Based on this information, she makes an estimate, and if you approve it, she creates a sample. Only then does she ask for a deposit. Thereafter, most of the work can be done on the phone.

Choose someone who does setup and takedown, urges Reesor. You'll do your fair share of work, planning any party, but professional helpfulness can make it a pleasure, not just a project. Convenient sidelines like Schnoll's candy machines may be an additional factor in deciding who will do your event.

Asked about trends, Schnoll identifies a growing preference, both in balloons and table decor, for muted but elegant colours like teal, purple and silver. With regard to themes, there's been a lot of interest in sports, musicals from the 60s to the present, and – you guessed it – Harry Potter.

Does the Harry Potter craze herald a shift to magic and fantasy themes? Well, Schnoll had one client who wanted a Wizard of Oz party, but he won't try to predict the future.

Like decor trends, gift-giving reflects other social developments. Schnoll, for instance, welcomes the current interest in charity baskets for bar or bat mitzvahs.

Creativity depends partly on input from the client and also, Reesor emphasizes, on the decorator's hands-on work. A lot of great ideas, whether with regard to flowers or other objects, come from handling and experimenting with materials. In design and organization alike, details are vital.

ARTY PARTY, WHERE THE GUESTS TAKE PART

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Many people dream of starting a home business. They long for the rewards of independence, interesting work and the chance to be creative. For women who have children, a home business is a way to earn money while being available as mothers.

Those who accept the risks and the long hours don't just dream about having their own business – they do it. Cayla Hochberg of Arty Party (905-764-2264) is one woman who wasn't satisfied with dreaming.

Hochberg started Arty Party while on maternity leave. Her motives were twofold: she wanted to be at home for her son, and when it was time to return to work, she wanted something other than an office job.

Cayla Hochberg's Arty Party entertains kids like Bennie Shapiro.

One day her sister complained that all kids' parties are the same. So Hochberg organized a party for her, providing the kids with materials to make poster roll tubes into rattlesnake piggy banks. The party was a success: the kids had fun.

That was how Arty Party came into being. What Hochberg set out to do then, she's still doing. The guests take an active part in her parties, not just by being entertained, but by creating something. And none of her parties is a copy of any other.

"Uniqueness" is an over-used word, but it really is what people want, and it's hard to achieve. So Hochberg, from the beginning, has studied the party industry to find out what she can do to make her parties different from others.

Arty Party does plenty of work on themes like Barney the Dinosaur or a Day at the Beach. For a Day at Candy Land, for example, the kids decorated candy jars, created personalized chocolate bar wrappers, and made lollipop pencil tops.

Don't underestimate your own creativity; you can choose or create your own party theme. If you prefer, Hochberg will create it for you. Then again, you may come up with something together, which neither of you might have thought of on your own.

One of Hochberg's favourite ideas is a Friendship Book, with pages for specific purposes: favourite Web sites, friends' phone numbers, games like hangman, tick-tac-toe or connect the dots and wax pages for stickers. A book like this is something the kids will not only take home but have fun with again and again.

Arty Party's best testimonial is for kids to have fun. Each of 15 happy party guests may think of getting parents to call Hochberg for his or her next party.

Kids themselves will create something unique if you give them a chance, Hochberg says. For one party, each of 15 kids got a T-shirt to paint, with Tweety Bird in white on a black background. Each child had the same palette of colours, but none of them produced the same Tweety Bird despite the cartoon character's popularity.

Arty Party is easy on your budget; its inventiveness (yours and your guests' as well as Hochberg's) ensures no two parties are the same. Hochberg uses recycled materials a lot; besides being inexpensive and good for the environment, they encourage ingenuity.

Hochberg will also go to your house or other venue and stay for the whole event if you want. She does school and camp work too, as well as adult events like showers, birthdays and corporate parties. Arty Party also offers pre-packaged craft kits for events that Hochberg does not attend, and these craft kits can be put together as gifts.

Hochberg advises booking at least two weeks in advance, farther ahead if you can. This not only makes planning and organizing easier, it gives creative ideas more time to germinate.

On Nov. 23, from 7 to 10 p.m., you can meet Hochberg in person, without booking an appointment. She will be exhibiting at the Entrepreneurs at Home Show, at Temple Sinai. All 25 exhibitors have successful home businesses.

Renaissance of Ketubah art

She began her commercial art career creating illuminated Haftorah portions for bar mitzvahs, incorporating images pertaining to the child, such as family trees, family names.

The bar mitzvah "is really a major step in a child's life. To be able to look back on it is so special."

She said when she started the calligraphy she did ketubot in her spare time. "Now I devote an equal amount of time to both.

"In the last 15 years, there's been a renaissance of ketubah art," she said.

Indeed, people have been commissioning work through the Internet, she added. "I have a Web site – www.ketubahbykarny.com." She's had commissions from as far away as Israel, France, Colombia, Venezuela, Morocco and Italy.

Rivlin Vorona also does gifts for baby namings and brit milahs, illuminating the name of the child.

And she does other non-commercial calligraphy artwork. "My art has been travelling the world in juried exhibitions."

One of her works was chosen to be exhibited in the national cathedral of Washington, D.C., at the 1999 juried exhibition called Vision of the Spirit, which celebrated the new millennium.

"The focal point of this artwork is the Star of David, with shalom written in the middle in gold. This artwork was used to promote the whole exhibition. I'm very proud of that."

Great places to throw a party

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

With the recent makeover at Beth Tikvah (416-221-3433 ext. 307), parties will be even more elegant, says Lillian Cornfield, director of administration.

"We've just renovated the sanctuary and social hall. There are new stage curtains and we've painted decoratively. We've also added two faux windows and put seven crystal sconces on the walls," she says.

"It looks like a new room. There are muted tones of cream, and a leafy design throughout the room makes it look even more elegant than before. As well, the room dividers have been recovered."

The sanctuary and social hall, when combined, can accommodate about 450 people with the dance floor."We can also partition the room for smaller parties, from 120 guests."

About four years ago, she says, Beth Tikvah became the first Conservative congregation in the city to offer an open kitchen – a choice of four caterers. "This is a great benefit because clients have a choice of catering styles and can study prices; they have an option."

When clients book a party – about two years in advance for a bar/bat mitzvah and a wedding as soon as possible – Beth Tikvah's staff can help with the planning. "We can provide lists for all the services they need, and they can always call us with questions. We're easily accessible," says Cornfield.

'Clients are booking the halls at least one year in advance'

Weddings are especially elegant at Beth Tikvah, says Cornfield, when they are done "in the round. We put the chupah on the floor, and chairs are placed around it. It is an inclusive, intimate ceremony. Guests rave about it."

They are able to offer guests more options, she says, because seating in the sanctuary is not permanent. "We can provide a long aisle or a short aisle; it is possible to accommodate many different requests.

"We're trying to update the hall and make it more welcoming for brides," she says.

Paul Racco, co-owner of Match Bar and Grill (905-850-5699) with Domenic Chiaromonte and Tony Mastronardi, says they can accommodate parties of up to 300 people.

"We have two modern rooms done in yellows and golds, and clients can use either room, or both. The banquet rooms are decorated with pictures, armoires, plants and mirrors, so a lot of added decoration is unnecessary," he says.

He says that clients are booking the halls at least one year in advance, especially during high season, such as spring or fall.

Le Royal Meridien King Edward (416-863-3241) "is known for hosting magical social events," says Loretta Radigan, a representative at the hotel.

"We provide both the ambiance and a team of experienced planners who can assist clients down to the finest details."

The Vanity Fair ballroom, with its vaulted ceilings and "grand chandeliers, creates a setting of understated elegance," she says.

The Windsor ballroom has mirrored walls, chandeliers and a private reception area "that provides the perfect venue for an intimate gathering," says Radigan.

RELIEVE PARTY STRESS: Work with a consultant

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

For any large-scale party, you'll probably hire a consultant. Consultants Sarah Cherry (905-764-7121) and Karen Freedman (905-707-6466) have a wealth of suggestions on how to benefit from their services.

Cherry recommends finding a consultant through referrals, the way she finds clients. Pick someone who's relaxed, yet organized, and not too busy to give you her devoted attention. You might choose someone who works with a partner, as she does: Two heads generate more ideas and provide each other with backup, she says.

However joyous the occasion, Freedman observes, planning it will be stressful. It's a complex project with strict deadlines; you have a huge stake in it, and strong emotions, even good ones, create stress. A consultant should relieve this stress, making you feel like a guest at your own party.

A good consultant "thinks on her feet"

Attention to detail is crucial, Cherry says. She sees herself as building a party piece by piece, the way a builder puts up a house brick by brick.

Sort out the specifics of "who, what, where, when and why," Cherry advises – starting with your guest list. At a wedding, for instance, it must satisfy not only the bride, but the groom and both their parents.

"What" is the kind of celebration: wedding, bar mitzvah, etc. "Why" is similar, but finer-tuned. Is the event traditional or modern? And what's special about it, besides the main purpose? Weddings, for example, are often somewhat like a family reunion, bringing three or four generations together.

"Where" and "when" are the logistics. Is your event in a synagogue? A hotel? Is the layout convenient? What about booking dates and rehearsals? To help with logistics, Cherry supplies a checklist of things to do, from the day you book her right down to the event.

She also offers clients a brochure listing bands, makeup artists and other professionals. Both consultants think it is essential to know good people in all facets of their industry; and both emphasize teamwork, which requires organizational skills, plus rapport with people.

Not everything requires the consultant's presence, Freedman points out. You can probably see people like the florist on your own. Moreover, you have to offer your own ideas and input, and there are things only you can do, such as the seating plan.

As for budget, Cherry says she's there to help you save, watch your money closely and keep track of expenses with a checklist. On the other hand, Freedman warns against false economies. The cliché holds true: you get what you pay for.

Book a consultant, Freedman and Cherry advise, immediately after setting a date, even years ahead. You need time to iron out details and build rapport. Your consultant also needs time to get the other people you want, because they too take advance bookings.

Anything as complex as a wedding, Freedman adds, involves changes in plans. A good consultant "thinks on her feet," solving problems as they arise, but early booking reduces the pressure created by such changes.

You should be able to see your consultant in person as often as necessary, Cherry maintains. If you relax better at home, she should make house calls. If you need her to "hold your hand" for reassurance, she should be there.

Freedman usually sets up two meetings. One is to get acquainted, establish rapport, and outline the overall shape of the event; the other is to fine-tune details. Then comes the rehearsal, and finally there's the big night.

Cherry believes in attending a party from start to finish. That's the only way to co-ordinate everyone, making sure the videographer is on hand when needed, for example.

It's OK to expect a lot from a consultant, Cherry reassures you. In her experience, demanding clients are often the most loyal. Freedman reminds you, though, that however much the consultant does for you, the final decisions are yours alone.

Food glorious food

Malmar also caters for smaller groups — for brit milahs, shivahs and meals for out-of-town guests.

After 30 years there's a lot of repeat business, Schaffer says.

"We have reached the stage where we're making wedding and brises for the people we've made bar and bat mitzvahs for, and we're doing bar and bat mitzvahs for the children of people whose weddings we catered."

Another popular kosher catering company in Toronto is Tri Elm Catering (416-222-1230), which is based at B'nai Torah synagogue and at the Borochov Centre.

Joe Elmaleh, 33, president of Tri Elm, says his company provides kosher catering for the Regency Banquet and Convention Centre, the Luxor and the Regal Constellation Hotel.

"We can go anywhere. We have turned customers' garages into prep centres. We've turned people's homes into party centres.

"We do a lot of take-out cold dairy platters for brises, for morning bar mitzvahs and kiddushes. We also do a lot of work with organizations and schools, such as NCSY and CHAT."

Elmaleh, a father of four, graduated in business administration, hospitality and tourism. He was a mashgiach during his days at yeshiva, which is what got him interested in the catering business, he says. He established Tri Elm 10 years ago.

"We have an enthusiastic staff with many years of experience," Elmaleh says. "We're glatt kosher under strict supervision of the Vaad Hakashruth of Toronto."

Tri Elm's head chef is an expert in French and Middle Eastern cuisine.

He says a typical five-course dinner includes a choice of appetizer, salad, soup, any choice of chicken or beef served with vegetables and a side dish, as well as dessert, coffee and tea.

Tri Elm also offers a prime rib five-course dinner for $39 per person, which includes salmon appetizers, cream of asparagus soup, California salad, prime rib of beef served with vegetables and red potatoes, opera cake, coffee, tea and a full deluxe dessert table.

Elmaleh says one of Tri Elm's most popular dishes is salmon surprise – fresh Atlantic salmon wrapped in a phyllo dough – served with angel-hair pasta, sun-dried tomatoes and fresh basil and covered with a light lemon sauce. For an evening event, this dish would cost $29 per person as part of a five-course dinner.

Chicken Balentine, a boneless breast of chicken stuffed with wild rice and fresh vegetables and roasted in a white mushroom sauce, is another popular main course dish.

"We're very reasonably priced in the market," says Elmaleh. "You'll find that our quality and service is at its utmost. We like to give a good quality service for the right price. We have one of the best prices in the city for kosher catering.

"We guarantee our price once we close it with a customer... This allows the customer to stay within their projecte budget.

"We're flexible when dealing wit customers and we try to accommodat them. Our motto is 'total custome service."

For more informal gatherings, buffet are easier to set up than sit-down dinner in private homes, Elmaleh says. "Peopl choose them at bar/bat mitzvot to have more fun atmosphere."

Tri Elm has set up international buffet with different stations offering foods fron different countries. They've also offere a wide variety of other buffet stations from Chinese specialties to salads an crepes, to hors-d'oeuvres and potatoes "We [can even] have our chefs cookin outside in front of the guests."

Another service Tri Elm provides is banquet manager who coordinates th evening, Elmaleh says. "That allows u to manage the function properly an enables the clients to be guests at thei own affairs."

Elmaleh explains that clients ofte need help in other areas of party planning as well. "They come to us for all our pro fessional advice, not only for menu se lection, but also for linen colours, pho tographers, video. We help them plan th party... We become part of the function."

LAS VEGAS — Call us a couple of crazy lovebirds. Vince and I got married in October last year, but our hectic schedules found us honeymooning in Nevada in July.

There was no mistaking that at 47.2 C, we were definitely in the desert. We'd chosen to spend our honeymoon in sybaritic splendour in Las Vegas, a town that is famous for its gaudy casinos, glamorous showgirls and glitzy entertainment. In the old days, it was also infamous for its gangsters and legendary headliners like Frank Sinatra's Rat Pack.

I first came upon Las Vegas in the mid-'70s. Now, at the beginning of the new millennium, it's amazing how much it's been transformed from a hick town to Entertainment Central, U.S.A.

Top-notch entertainment like master magician Lance Burton, and Cirque du Soleil make this place a must-see, even for those of us who aren't really big-time gamblers.

We wanted a hotel that was centrally situated on the Strip, like Harrah's, Caesar's Palace, or the Imperial Palace – where we stayed – so that we didn't have to go far to get anywhere. Upon arriving at our hotel, we discovered, to our bashful amusement, that our mini-suite offered a canopied bed with a mirrored ceiling, and a double-sized tub in the middle of the room. Oy Vegas, the mind boggles!

Eager for some first-class pampering, we stopped by the Canyon Ranch Spa Club, located in the Venetian Casino and Hotel. They suggested we try the Rasul Ritual. In the Rasul chamber built for two, we were able to apply different coloured therapeutic muds to each other's face, arms, back and legs. Then it was time for relaxing aromatic steam and a warm rain shower rinse under a blue fibre-optic "night" sky. A relaxing side-by side massage wrapped up this heavenly treatment.

Then we nipped over to Caesar's Palace, where Caesar's Magical Empire enchanted us. It's a unique dinner-theatre, where sorcerers and their apprentices serve up fantasy with amazing feats of wizardry and hilarity.

Afterwards we surrendered ourselves to the unique charms of Canada's own Cirque du Soleil. With Mystère, Cirque du Soleil trades in its travelling big top for a permanent home in a state-of-the-art theatre at the Treasure Island Casino.

At the Bellagio Casino, O, another Cirque du Soleil production, reportedly inspires audiences with its creation of a mystical water world.

It was most romantic when we went out for our evening strolls. It was somewhat cooler, and the skyline was ablaze with spectacular colourful lights. Some casinos offered free or relatively inexpensive outdoor displays, such as Bellagio's breathtaking dancing fountains, the Flamingo's exotic bird sanctuary, the Venetian's gondola rides, Harrah's outdoor bazaar and Treasure Island's battling pirates, yo-ho-ho.

Peter Reveen, a courtly, fascinating gentleman, contributed greatly to the success of our trip. Born in Australia, he is best known as Canada's foremost theatrical hypnotist, Reveen The Impossiblist. He is also one of the founding members of the famous Magic Castle in Los Angeles.

Upon retiring from the stage, he relocated his family to Las Vegas, where he is active as Master Magician Lance Burton's personal manager. It was Reveen who negotiated the deal that led to the Lance Burton Theatre at the Monte Carlo Resort and Casino. As well, he is the current international ambassador of the Variety Club of Southern Nevada.

Reveen gave us a tour of the elegantly appointed neighbourhoods beyond the gaudy Las Vegas Strip. He showed us the Congregation Ner Tamid, where he had his Jewish conversion a year earlier, at the age of 64.

"During the most difficult times of my life, it was the people of the Jewish faith who reached out to me," Reveen says.

His beautiful house in Green Valley, where he resides with his wife Coral, is decorated with exquisite artifacts from their travels, collected during the years they toured together.

Throughout the day, he enlightened us with his vast knowledge of Las Vegas past and present. For instance, we discovered that the new mayor of Las Vegas, Oscar B. Goodman, is Jewish. Notably, Goodman is one of the city's premier criminal defence attorneys, and is considered one of the best trial lawyers in America.

Then it was time for Lance Burton's Magic Show, where we were astounded by such amazing feats as a disappearing automobile. And we were thunderstruck when at one point Burton was onstage, and then poof – with lots of smoke and no mirrors – he popped up in the audience, just a few rows behind us! It was a thrill when, after the show, he dropped by to say hello.

Then we dropped by the Rivera Casino to see the showgirls in Crazy Girls! Luckily you don't have to be a high-stakes gambler to enjoy the place.

If you're looking for a natural wonder, take one of the many tours and you'll see interesting sights indigenous to the desert area.

First and foremost, though, Las Vegas is a gambling town, and we discovered that some casinos now carry thousand-dollar slot machines. Of course, we stayed true to our budget, sensibly favouring the nickel slots, which provided hours of mindless fun, while the high rollers at the gaming tables mesmerized us from afar.

Although neither of us can claim any stupendous winnings at the casinos, all in all, we felt lucky to have had such an exciting, entertaining and romantic honeymoon in Las Vegas.

Interactive Entertainers...

Entertainers push guests' sensations

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Interactive disc jockeys can make your simchah the talk of the town. "These DJs can move the crowd from the moment the guests enter the hall," says Ed McMurtry of Mr. Disc Jockey/Edwin Allen Productions (1-877-473-3800).

McMurtry has created an entrance in which guests walk into a pitch black room. "The only thing visible is the lit dance floor. To get to it, they have to manoeuvre through statues, which turn out to be our dancers.

"This entrance pushes the guests' sensations; they feel as if they are in a catwalk in Paris," he says.

He has also had guests walk into a scene from Michael Jackson's Thriller, in which three feet of mist clouds the room. "Dancers move toward the crowd as they enter. The guests are overwhelmed," he says.

Jared Florence, president of Entertainment Xtreme (416-488-8411) often begins a party with a group of professional dancers who dance with the guests for the first hour. "It sets the ultimate party tone."

Kids and adults alike enjoy being tattooed by an airbrush artist who either creates stencils for a particular occasion or comes with hundreds of his own stencils, says Florence. "The artist also has crystal tattoos which create a shimmering effect. Kids love it, and the tattoos do no harm to clothing."

David Hart, a co-owner of Hart Entertainment (416-762-2200) says the company recently launched a Web site – www.hartentertainment.com – in which they can read about everything the company offers, and book a party online. "It's a shopping basket. All the prices are there, and they can receive information day and night."

Guests love props that are "live and working. We've had a miniature golf course set up around the room, and have even supplied the score cards. The course can be set up to fit most size rooms.

"At every party, there are some kids that are not into dancing, and things such as a castle maze, bungee run or carnival games gives these kids something to do. Kids also eat dinner quickly, and need to be entertained while the adults are eating," says Florence.

When clients book with Universal Sound (905-619-4558) they each get a home page, says owner Grant Cowan. "Pictures can be posted on the page, which is accessed with a password, and they can give this password to friends and family who can go online, view the pictures, and leave messages."

He advises clients that when booking a disc jockey, "you should not book with a particular DJ in mind. If you book in advance, it is likely that by the time your party comes around, the DJ you booked will not be with the company. If you book with a proven service, you can be assured that you will get a great DJ. We do not have different tiers of DJs; all are experienced and all are top performers."

Rick Levine of Times Square Entertainment and the Rick Levine Band (905-881-6400), says that guests of all ages can have a great time at a party if the entertainer plays music to please everyone. "They need to know when to play what music."

A good combination, he says, is to have a band play for much of the evening, and then have a disc jockey complement the band. "This covers a wide range of guests, and everyone is happy."

An entertainment company can help clients organize the evening, says Levine. "They can suggest when to make speeches and have candlelighting, and they can ensure that the right music is played at the right time."

It is important, he says, to have a good quality sound system that is played at a reasonable volume. "Even if the acoustics in the room are not good, a good system makes the music sound great."

Tal Maissner, general manager of Freedom of Sound (905-760-0040), owned by Miki Klevan, says a collaboration of interactive entertainment and live music adds something special to a party.

"We've had a disco band or a 60s theme band perform isolated acts throughout the evening. It creates constant energy, and gives the party heart and soul."

The cocktail hour is also important, he says, because the mood is created as soon as the guests enter the party. "A jazz trio, or even a mentalist – who levitates items or guesses what is on guests' minds – puts them in a party mood."

To add something unique to a party, says Maissner, they have brought in a three-feet tall and eight-feet long ice bar. "It is used as an actual bar, and a name can be carved into the ice. It adds flare to a winter wonderland theme."

Cory Mandell recently celebrated the tenth anniversary of Mandell Entertainment (905-886-4000) by opening offices in Israel in order to cater to clients having bar/bnai mitzvot there. Parties can be arranged here or in Israel, says Mandell.

Recent auditions held at the Capitol Event theatre – Mandell's own venue, available for such things as parties, weddings or fund-raisers – attracted over 1,200 performers competing for 80 spots as entertainers, dancers and MCs.

"From this, we developed the Mandell Entertainment Power Pac, available for all types of parties, which features performers who have danced at Toronto Raptor games, or performed in Rent, Lion King or Mama Mia. These performers will stay for your entire party to entertain and dance with the guests," he says.

A dance studio has been built at his offices, says Mandell, and a choreographer, Lauren Collis, will help develop a dance routine for the bar or bat mitzvah child, which they will incorporate into the opening routine. "The boy or girl comes to our studio to rehearse."

He also also set up a showroom in order to view Mandell Entertainment's large selection of games and amusements.

Custom chupahs and other Judaica fabrics

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Fabric artist Haya Nativ is able to create a special family heirloom to commemorate one of the most important life-cycle events.

Nativ (416-633-2664) designs custom chupahs that can be used as wall-hangings after the wedding ceremony.

"I work on commission. I design the piece and I execute it," she says, explaining that she works closely with the family to create these heirlooms.

The custom chupahs are between 5 and 7 square feet, depending on the size of a frame of a particular synagogue, and start at $2000. She also provides consulting services to people who wish to design their own chupahs.

"The chupah that I made for the chapel at Beth Tikvah hangs on the wall. It's designed as a wall hanging. You take it off once in a while."

The chupah at Beth Tikvah.

She says the synagogue built a beautiful frame to display the painted silk chupah, which resembles stained glass — the images are outlined with black cloth which is appliquéd onto the more transparent silk fabric. "The stained glass technique looks beautiful when the light is behind it, because of the transparency of the cloth."

The painted images on the Beth Tikvah chupah include the symbols of the wedding — a wine cup, grapes for the celebration, a dove to represent shalom bayit, a shaft of wheat symobolizing prosperity and a pomegranate symbolizing fertility.

These symbols are framed by circles and the space around the circles is covered with stars, which are also symbols of fertility, Nativ says.

"You're supposed to be wed under the stars."

While her background is not Sephardi, Nativ says she is inspired by Sephardi ornamental design, which is very geometric. "I am fascinated by Sephardi art and I use it often."

She has organized various Judaica art community projects, including the creation of a quilt by members of a Jewish women's organization; the quilt now hangs in the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Nativ works intricately on painted silk for her challah and matzah covers, which start at $100, and for her various other wedding gifts she creates. Working on commissions from institutions, she has created the table cover for the bimah at Aish HaTorah and a Torah mantel for the Lodzer Centre.

Born in Israel, Nativ studied visual arts and taught in Ramat Ha-Sharon.

However, she did not begin her work as a Judaica artist until she came to Toronto. She immigrated to Canada 10 years ago with her husband and three children and began her career in teaching textile art to adults.

One of her students introduced Nativ to Judaica art, she says. "I discovered this world that I didn't know about before… I found my niche. I've been doing it since then."

Her career gives her tremendous satisfaction, she adds. "I enjoy my work very much…I feel that I'm lucky to have my hobby as a profession."

Haya Nativ's chupahs can be used as wall-hangings.

Kids' clothing follows adult trends

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Children's clothing follows adult trends, says Claudia Chad of PhD Clothing (482-4209).

"Whatever the trends are in Europe and California, that's where we're at," says Chad, who carries clothing for boys and girls up to size 16.

At the moment, she says, "any length goes; girls are wearing long skirts and short skirts."

Comfort is very important this year and girls are wearing long, cozy tops over their skirts and cargo flares. "Techno-fibre with a crinkly feel is important in charcoal or gun metal greys or black, with oranges and reds as an accent colour."

Boys are also wearing cargo pants and techno-fibres, says Chad. "The slouch look is in big time, and boys are wearing the slouched pants accented with toggles at the waist, the pant bottoms and the zippers – just everywhere. It is in to have a lot of little things attached to the pants."

For dressy events, says Chad, girls are wearing their skirts "long, long, long.

"The romantic look is still important, and outfits are mostly two pieces with flowing, taffeta skirts. Girls are topping these skirt with shimmering tight-bodiced tube tops topped with bolero jackets or shawls."

Colours, she says, are dusty rose, pinks, burgandies, black, charcoal and grey.

"These two piece outfits are very versatile. Girls can mix and match them, and when they have a lot of parties to go to, that can save a lot of money. Each outfit looks different."

PARTY PLANNER

Of carats, karats and choosing with care

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

The more you care for someone, the greater your care in choosing a gift. This holds true whether you're a child spending your allowance on Mom or Dad's birthday present or a groom buying a wedding ring.

However, the groom is more aware of the esthetic, technical and economic aspects of his purchase. Precious stones and metals have always been popular. Often they're beautiful even in their raw state. Being durable, they symbolize lasting relationships. Because they're rare, though, and require skilled craftwork to heighten their beauty, they're costly.

To be sure he gets the best possible jewelry, advice and workmanship, a groom should choose his jeweller with care. Lilliane Moses of Lilliane's Fine Jewellery (416-920-7676) offers sound advice on making wedding ring choices.

Among the most loved gems are pearls. Things to look for in a pearl are lustre, a spherical shape, and cleanliness (not too many blemishes). The white variant should be pure, perhaps with a rosy overtone, but not creamy.

South Sea pearls are usually white, with light green, rose pink or silver white overtones. At 10 to 16 or 17 millimetres in diameter, they are larger than many pearls. Tahitian pearls, from black oysters, are black or silver grey, sometimes with subtle green or reddish overtones.

Tanzanite is an extremely rare stone, mined only in one pocket in Tanzania. Its natural colour is greyish brown, but when heat-treated, it transforms into a brilliant, sparkling violet blue.

Diamonds, says Moses, are always in style. There are four Cs to look for: cut, clarity, colour and carat. No two diamonds catch and reflect the light in exactly the same way.

COLOR GRADING SCALE BY G.I.A.

D E F	G H I J	K L M N	O P Q R S T U	V W X Y Z
colorless	near colorless	faint yellow	very light yellow	fancy yellow

CLARITY GRADING SCALE

FL/IF	VVS-1	VVS-2	VS-1	VS-2	SI-1	SI-2	I-1	I-2	I-3	I-4

FL Flawless
VVS Very very slight inclusions
VS Very slight inclusions
SI Slight inclusions
I Included

Among the standard cuts is the emerald cut, rectangular but with slanted corners. The marquise is boat- or eye-shaped. Most enduringly popular, says Moses, is the round cut. Considered the perfect cut, this has the most facets a diamond can have, and the greatest brilliance.

In diamonds, look for a clear white colour and an absence of inclusions. These are imperfections visible to the naked eye: tiny bits of foreign matter, trapped while the diamond was forming.

Note also the differences in "carats." Carat with a "c" is a measure of diamond weight equal to .200 metric grams. Karat with a "k," however, is a measure of the purity of gold: 24-karat is 100 percent pure, 18-karat, 75 percent, etc. Fourteen- and 18-karat gold are alloys. Red gold is alloyed with copper, and white with silver, nickel or palladium; yellow gold is alloyed with copper and palladium. Pure 24-karat gold is also yellow.

While knowing a few basics is helpful and makes choosing a gift more interesting, there's much more to your choice than science. You have to like the look of the stone. As Moses puts it, it should "romance" you.

Respect and trust your tastes. No law dictates that you obey trends. Last year, white gold and small jewelry were popular; this year, it's yellow gold and bigger jewelry. Who can foretell what the trend will be next year? Many people prefer traditional styles and cuts, but even within a tradition, there's room for uniqueness.

In a jeweller, look for the same reliability and honesty you seek in any professional, advises Moses. If anything is wrong with a piece, for example, you should be able to have it repaired without any trouble. And rapport is vital: the moment you step into a store, you should feel welcome.

Moses specializes in custom work, and enjoys being creative. Even so, she has known clients to fall in love with something they see in a display case, already finished.

Moses recommends placing your order two weeks to a month in advance. This allows time for craft work, the ordering of materials if necessary and the developing of creative ideas. Just as you choose your gift carefully, let your jeweller have time to take equal care.

Avoid 'simchah syndrome': hire a party planner

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

While party planning is a relatively new profession, it's proven its worth to hosts many times over. It therefore pays to ask yourself what qualifications a planner should have. Heather Hennick of Henco Consulting Inc. (905-881-5736) has plenty of useful ideas on how to choose and work with your planner.

The bigger a simchah, the more work there is to do. Your planner organizes your simchah, she recommends other party professionals to you and she helps with legwork. In sum, she should save you work as well as stress, or what Hennick calls "simchah syndrome."

Useful ideas from Henco.

Over the years, Hennick has observed that one key quality her clients want is experience. Not only does it mean greater practical knowledge of what's doable, it also means that if surprises or difficulties pop up, a veteran trouble shooter will have a cooler head than a novice.

Experience goes along with being attuned to the "party marketplace." The range of goods and services available is huge, a specialty in its own right. What's more, it's constantly changing.

Suppose you book your planner six months before your simchah, which is a bar mitzvah with a science theme. Three months later, a store opens specializing in science for kids. A planner who lets you know about this may make a key contribution to your event's success.

A planner should be creative. She should know how to improvise, and she should be able to take tried and true ideas from her experience and put them together in new ways.

Hands-on knowledge of an artform is another asset. A planner who does set design, for instance, will be valuable in helping with decor. She will know the qualities of materials needed, how to use them in original ways and how to get the best quality for your money.

In this respect, Henco is special. All artistic work is done in-house: invitations, calligraphy, floral design, props, centrepieces, balloons and entertainment. And Henco's new Creation Stations offer entertainment packages, with henna and crystal body art, photo novelties and interactive games.

To demonstrate the good sense of this one-stop concept, Hennick uses the analogy of a car. Would you search around the city for parts, then have several people assemble them? No. You'd buy your car from one dealer, in one piece, ready to drive home.

Hennick's approach creates events that "flow," with all the facets integrated and harmonious. Everything from the overall concept to the tiniest detail is part of a larger whole.

She advises you to choose your party planner in person. Don't make this vital decision on the phone. Only face-to-face contact will tell if she has the qualifications you're looking for.

Book your party planner three to six months ahead. Remember that a lot of the logistics need to be worked out well in advance; invitations, for example, must be in the mail four to six weeks before your party. And to keep "simchah syndrome" at bay, you must allowing plenty of time.

Ask any prospective party planner all the relevant questions about credentials and skills. Good communication and rapport are essential. And to put her skills at your service, your planner has to hear from you what you want.

For each client, Hennick compiles an "intake portfolio." This is a record of every pertinent detail, including such things as design preferences, colour themes, special needs of guests, special meals and budget restraints.

Then there's follow-up. Hennick says she meets each client roughly three times; but the number of meetings counts less than ongoing organization and attention to detail.

If you choose your planner well, you won't only enjoy your party. With "simchah syndrome" banished, the planning itself will be fun.

Table and chair covers can transform your party room

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Table and chair covers can transform an ordinary dining room into an elegant banquet hall, says Ben Rich of Chair Decor Etc. Inc. (905-731-9217).

Rich specializes in renting chair covers, specialty table cloths, backdrops, head table decorations, accessories and specialty table linens.

"At a reasonable price, these items can set the mood and look of your function," he says.

His company has about 22 styles of cloths, ranging from satin stripes or brocade to zebra stripes. "For a bat mitzvah, we've used a shiny silver cover in the shape of a sea shell.

"We also carry overlays, which are placed over the regular cloth. They may be glittery with silver stars, white with shimmers, black with stars, or leopard. It all depends on the mood of the party and the client's tastes."

Chair covers can be paired with a choice of about 22 styles of accent bands, which can match the colour scheme of the room. "Some favourites are organza rosette accent bands or tassels that can be attached to the back of the cover. We've also used animal print accent bands to accessorize the chairs and overlay for a theme party. They all add something very special to a room."

He also rents a variety of napkin rings and charger plates in gold or silver. "We suggest that clients come into the showroom and choose from our samples.

"When deciding what to use, we work backwards," Rich says. "We choose the covers or accessories to match the colour scheme and the theme of the party."

Justin Abikzir of Premier Linens (905-763-3810) says that unique linens and chair covers "help cheer up a room. After one wedding, the bride and groom gave us a hug - they were so pleased with the way the room looked."

For bar or bat mitzvot, they have used "a funky black cloth with splashes of red, white, royal blue and yellow, or a plain black cloth with white napkins.

"The chair cover could be a stretchy black material, with different colour bows. We really do have a lot of fun putting it all together," says Abikzir.

For weddings, he says, they use a more classic floor-length cloth – most are tone-on-tone damask – in colours ranging from white to wheat. "The overlay could be chiffon, and we would use the same material for the chairs. It is quite an elegant look, and it can be done at a reasonable price."

Abikzar will come to a client's home to show then samples and will meet them at the party venue to see the table settings "and get a true picture of what your room will look like."

Something Personal (905-405-0336) adds something special to any party.

Lisa Shea, owner of Something Personal, says she akes Hershey chocolate bars – dairy or pareve – and adds a iew "glossy, shiny wrapper, printed with any message or picture a client requests.

"They can send me the photo or plain text and I prepare he wrapper."

Clients have made up "fun ingredients" on the label such as nicknames, pet peeves and aspirations, for a 16th birthday party.

"The kids just love receiving the chocolate as a party favour," she says.

For a 40th birthday, she inscribed dreams and aspirations of the man as a young man, and the actual reality – "a great dad and a loving husband."

A bar or bat mitzvah chocolate bar could include a photo of the bar/bat mitzvah on the front, and an inscription of something personal about the child on the back. "A bar is placed at each plate. Guests think it's a great idea."

Shea says she needs about five business days to produce the labels. Requests can also be e-mailed to www.personalised chocolate.com.

Working with your videographer

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Most fields today, including videography, are undergoing rapid technological progress.

Josh Israel of Video Productions by Josh (905-709-9277), and Darren Sager of DMS Video Productions (905-470-4040), both welcome this progress; but their success with clients also depends on intangibles, like rapport.

If Israel were choosing a videographer for the first time, he'd start by scouting the three best-known, most experienced people within his budget. Also, he'd ask friends whom they've used: the best testimonial is a satisfied client.

People in the trade are good for references, but can be biased. If you do ask for references, though, follow them up.

Read your contract carefully, Israel advises; and avoid unexpected extra charges. Get someone who's up front about all costs, including incidentals. The more protection for the company, the less protection for you. And insist on a 24-hour cooling-off period, to allow time to study a contract.

Use a videographer who's familiar with your kind of event, Israel urges. If it's a Jewish wedding, don't hire someone who only does corporate work, no matter how good they are. Don't just listen to their "pitch" either: look at their work. And though some people value editing above all, Israel thinks camera work counts just as much.

Considering the rapid advances in the field, Sager recommends picking someone with an eye on the future. People are used to VHS, the old video home system; but now DVD, digital video (or versatile) disc is hot. In three years, he says, over 10 million DVD players were sold in North America.

Sager lists several advantages of DVD. It lasts longer; it won't scratch, wear out, or get snagged on a spool like a tape. It has 500 lines of resolution, against VHS' 220 to 240. The audio quality is better. And it's easier to "navigate" from segment to segment.

At the same time, Sager warns against being dazzled by technology. Look for a professional who explains technicalities in lay terms: this proves they knows their work, while letting you know what kind of results to expect.

Make sure you see a sample tape done by the same person who will be taping your event, Israel recommends. And not only should they have a backup camera: it should be as good as the main camera.

Like any professional you hire, your videographer should be co-operative, Israel thinks – a "people person" as much as a technical expert. You must personally feel at ease with him, Sager adds. Before they start talking tech, they should introduce you to their staff, and build rapport with you.

Israel warns against having the same company do both video and photos. Some photographers and videographers use one specialty to lure clients into buying the other.

As Israel sees it, you don't really work with a videographer "during" your event: there's no time to make decisions in the middle of a party. Instead, they should know in advance everything that has to do be done, then just do it.

Sager characterizes a good videographer as friendly but unobtrusive. Because the new technology demands less light, they can be even less obtrusive than before. And to keep you and your guests at ease, they should treat your event as a story to cover, not a production which they script.

Book well in advance, Sager says; one or two years isn't too early. Only rarely can he take last-minute bookings.

At the first meeting, look for creative camera work and editing where you choose your videographer. Then, about a month before the event, confer again. While this can often be done on the phone, Sager is available for meetings in person then too.

Book 1½ to two years ahead for a bar or bat mitzvah, eight to 12 months for wedding, Israel advises. This allows time to work out details. Besides, the best videographers are in demand, and you want to be sure you get the one who's right for you.

Tri-Versa-Global Inc. lives up to its name

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In most branches of the party industry, success is based on a happy marriage of artistry and business sense. Lou Hoffer's Tri-Versa-Global Inc. (905-771-6494) is a case in point.

Tri-Versa-Global began with three clothing services: silk screening, cresting and embroidery. Hence the "Tri" in the name. "Versa" stands for versatile; and in keeping with this term, Hoffer has built a company with many different capabilities.

Today, only 15 percent of the company's business is clothing. Much of the other 85 percent comes from imprinted promotional products (such as a shoehorn with the shoe store's name), in which Tri-Versa-Global is one of the few specialists.

Seventy-five percent of its trade is now from businesses, to whom Hoffer proudly provides "a world of promotions." And he ships anywhere in the world – hence the "Global."

Private parties, which he himself looks after, comprise the remaining 25 percent of his business.

For parties, Tri-Versa-Global now has a partnership with Farco Entertainment, with Doo Doo the Clown and his performers, dancers, singers, clowns and musicians. Together, the two companies can make your event more fun.

All artwork is done in-house; and it's easier to co-ordinate creative work when artists working on the same order are all under one roof.

Minimizing the number of companies involved – just Tri-Versa-Global, the manufacturer, and possibly an importer – also increases convenience, and reduces the chance of glitches.

Hoffer cites as an instance a recent bar mitzvah with an indoor volleyball theme, where every guest got a beach towel and blanket, a beach ball and a pair of sunglasses. For all this, the client only had to deal with one company.

Hoffer finds his business exciting, because it's always changing, and he enjoys making a simchah memorable. They might do a bat mitzvah one week, a high school reunion the next. Recently, they did an 80th birthday party for a family matriarch. It was a cruise; and everyone wore a T-shirt saying "Fay's 80th."

You can come in with nothing more than an idea, as long as you come three to four weeks ahead of time. The company will show you a proof based on your idea; nothing is finalized until you approve the proof and sign it.

While Hoffer won't rule out rush orders, a time squeeze does limit the range of available products. This is especially the case with imports, which can take 12 to 14 weeks to bring in, and often have higher minimums.

In addition, you must order the manufacturer's minimum quantities. Low-cost items have higher minimums; for a $1.50 ballpoint pen, for example, it might be 50. You can't buy blanks; but aside from the fact that you can't buy single items, no order is too small.

Walking through Tri-Versa-Global's new full showroom is much better than reading a catalogue; and if a sample isn't on a shelf, you can order it. Also, for private meetings, the showroom has an attached boardroom.

The size of their stock in trade can be overwhelming; they have 2,000 to 3,000 pens alone. This is where the nine sales reps come in. Each specializes in a certain area, so you're sure to find the person you need.

They're on duty Monday to Friday 9:00 to 5:00, and for Sunday and weekend appointments. Each takes only one or two appointments a day, so as to give clients all the time they need. Besides your themes and product ideas, they work with your deadlines and budget.

Hoffer takes pride in honest, reliable, courteous customer service. In 14 years, he has never been late on an order; and he won't take one unless he can deliver on time. As to courtesy, Hoffer's motto is "business is never good enough that you can afford to be rude".

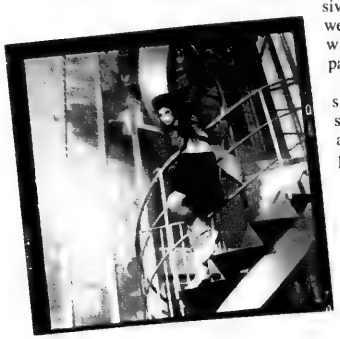
Women's fashions are elegant and understated

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Although dresses are "timidly" coming back, two-piece formalwear is the rage this season, says Maddalena Mini of Rinalena House of Fashions (416-256-3198).

Mini, who imports her fashions exclusively from Italy, says women are wearing long, flowing skirts paired with knit or silk tops to evening parties.



"Fashions are elegant, but simple and understated. Short sleeve tops with mesh inserts and a few accent stones are popular in pinks, green and earth tones."

Formal pants with a small amount of beading are straight legged and cuffed. "The preciousness of the formal pant is in the material," she says.

For more casual events, women are wearing knit suits in browns, greens and oranges. "Most skirts are long, to the ankle; long is more elegant and more slendering."

Mini foresees the '60s look coming back, with black and white geometrical designs "popping up everywhere."

To accessorize, she carries an exclusive line of Piero Guidi purses. "Formal purses are small – some are embroidered, and available in silk or leather, but the beaded antique look is also important."

Becky Scott, a buyer for Toni Plus and Michi Petites (416-633-9331) says that to casual parties, women are wearing "leather or faux leather pants with a silk charmeuse tie-blouse, or a soft-leg pant with a cozy cashmere or mohair sweater."

Lurex cardigan and shell sets paired with crepe pants – either narrow or wide – are important for house parties, says Scott. "Black is still big, and this year, silver has given way to gold, which is in big time.

Beautiful fashions from Rinalena House of Fashions.

"More formally, however, it is the season to dress up. Women are feeling glamourous in a sleek, sexy black gown, or polished and sophisticated in a great tuxedo pant suit."

Rich hues of gold, and irridescent jewel tones of sapphire, ruby and topaz are everywhere, she says, "with subtle beading and shine in luxe fabrics such as silk charmeuse, silk shantung and taffeta."

Another women's fashion store advertising in this supplement is: Michi, 416-250-5359.

Let your DJ entertain you

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

What does a disc jockey bring to a party? Yesterday's answer was simple: recorded music. Nowadays, however, DJs do much more than play CDs, a fact which Jeff Goldberg of Sonic Events (905-731-3215), and Eric Bouaziz of Starr Productions (905-882-6957) are well aware of.

Not only do today's DJs work with live entertainers, they themselves are ones. For years, Goldberg says, his work has been interactive. Bouaziz, for his part, sees his job as putting on an entire production.

Before choosing a DJ, urges Bouaziz, decide what you like. In an entertainer, personality is essential. Shop around and check references, Goldberg advises, but never book anyone on the phone. Meet face to face — not just the head DJ, but the one who's designated for your event.

A DJ should be conversant with current technology, as this enables the DJ to put on a better show. Generally, the younger the audience, the more liable they are to be enthusiastic about high-tech gadgetry.

In today's service-oriented economy, Goldberg sees his work as service as well. Choose a true professional who's available whenever you need him, and who, if you want, will come to you - someone who goes the extra mile for the client, he says.

Though he can accommodate short notice, Goldberg recommends booking six months to a year ahead. Bouaziz, who already has bookings for 2002, agrees.

Two or three weeks before a function Goldberg likes to hold another meeting in person, and go over details. The other entertainers, be they musicians or magicians, should also be there.

It's recommended that you pick a DJ who can ad lib. He has to sense spontaneous waves of feeling from the guests and ride them, says Bouaziz. "He doesn't have to be young, but he has to feel young." He needs the staying power to radiate positive energy throughout the evening. If he enjoys himself, so will your guests.

Since music pervades the entire party, Bouaziz continues, a DJ needs an overview of everything else that's happening. And because he has this overview, he's often asked for advice on lighting or other factors which indirectly relate to his job.

After an event, Goldberg makes a follow-up call to ask if the client is happy. A glitch doesn't count as badly in a client's mind as failure to fix it. People expect some problems; solving them increases one's credit.

A good name is fragile and hard to build, says Goldberg. If a professional does bad work, the client tells 25 people; if it's good work, he tells two. Bouaziz concurs. Because word of mouth makes or breaks a reputation, he'd rather do six events well than 10 well and 10 badly.

But what of that most essential element, the music? Both Goldberg and Bouaziz agree that a DJ should know not only what's in, but what's popular with any group, to entertain all ages from toddlers to retirees.

However, you can't always predict tastes by age. While many kids scoff at anything "dated," other younger people like music written generations ago: witness the swing revival. Older adults are less fad-driven, but their tastes are nevertheless diverse and they can attune themselves to trends.

Goldberg notes that while people follow trends to a degree, they also want their event to be unique. So let your DJ know anything that will give your party an individual flavour. At a family event, for example, make sure he knows Bubbie's name.

"Use the DJ's experience to your advantage," Goldberg says. All his knowledge is at your disposal. While you, the client, are sovereign and are free to disregard any advice, it's nevertheless a good idea to hear out the voice of experience. On this too, both DJs agree.

Suits designed with class

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Lou Myles has dressed many well-known celebrities. Bob Dylan, Tony Curtis, Wayne Gretzky and Shaquille O'Neal wear Myles' suits, as did Frank Sinatra and former Canadian prime minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Myles' wife, Wendy Switzer Myles, – she works closely with her husband – said she has fond memories of Trudeau, who died in September.

"He was a doll to work with. He was charming and witty and delightful … Trudeau was a man with a great personal style and he believed in carrying this out in his personal clothing."

He expressed his individuality through his clothing, she recalled.

"When I was reading the Globe and Mail [at the time of Trudeau's death], I saw those pictures of him, half of them were our clothes. There was a really dramatic coat my husband designed for him. Trudeau loved clothes with personality.

"We ran into Trudeau about three years ago and Lou asked him, 'Do you remember the caped coat?'

"'Remember it?' Trudeau said. 'I still wear it.'"

The way he looked and dressed was all part of "his charisma and the Trudeau package," Switzer Myles noted.

"The rose symbolized Trudeau … It shows that he took time to take that little extra step in personal grooming. All our suits have a lapel hole that actually opens. Behind it is silk thread to tie down the flower stem."

Those are the kinds of design details on a Lou Myles suit; he is one of the few retailers with handmade suits, Switzer-Myles said.

Made from the finest Italian and English wools in the world, the English-style suits sell for $895; a made-to-measure suit is slightly higher, she said.

A great English suit with square shoulders and a tapered waist, is the most flattering if it's well-tailored because it gives "the guy a defined silhouette," she explained. "We say our clothing makes a bad figure look good and a good figure look great."

Lou Myles has a factory and retail store in Woodbridge at 380 Millway Ave., (905-738-3333) and a retail outlet at 20 Toronto St. (416-365-7777), half a block north of the King Edward Hotel.

His agents can come to a home or office or customers can visit the retail locations which stock fine quality shoes, sweaters, and other high-end accessories. Women's suits can also be ordered.

Switzer Myles described her husband as someone with a "marvellous sense of fashion and style. He has always loved clothing and looking good."

Lou and Wendy Myles made headlines last month for their involvement in the Venetian Ball, a gala charity event for Villa Columbo Home for the Aged.

"We raised a net sum of $400,000, which is sensational," said Switzer Myles, the gala chair. "It was a great event for getting dressed to nines.

"The most elegant [look for men] is still a classic tuxedo done in super 150s – a fine designation of wool or a blend of fine wool blended with summer kid mohair – finished with pure silk lapels.

"That's what Lou Myles was wearing. He likes classic."

The appropriate complement to this outfit is a bow-tie to match the lapel, with "a crisp white wing collar shirt," she said "because there is no colour in the world that compliments the complexion like white. Nothing is as good as white. It's clean and crisp.

"The lapels [of a tuxedo] are pure silk either in satin or a grosgrain finish," she added.

She lamented that there were few opportunities to dress up. "The charity balls are formal. They've become the place to go to put a little occasion in your life."

She harkened back to an earlier time when people dressed up when they went out. "You would never go out on a Saturday night if you were not properly dressed. Now there's no place to go to dress up.

"I used to go to the Imperial Room [at the Royal York Hotel] every Saturday night. If a man wore a tux he would have not have been out of place… Women wore cocktail dresses. That was the whole point of going out."

She said the entertainment was also a big draw with such headliners as Vic Damone, Ella Fitzgerald, Peggy Lee and Tony Bennet performing there.

Myles told The CJN that Sinatra and Bennet inspired him to get into the clothing business when he was a teenager. "I loved the way they dressed.

Initially he worked for a menswear chain where he did all the designing. But they didn't carry the type of suit he was interested in selling and so in 1960 he started his own made-to measure suit company, setting up shop on Yonge Street.

He said all the stores were having their suits made in the same factories, which essentially created the same "baggy-style suit for the whole world. I didn't want the whole world."

Myles created his own market niche by designing the ivy jivey suit, which was a very fitted look, he said.

"I was getting my share of business from people who wanted to look different, who didn't want to look like everyone else. The store took off."

When he saw (Tony) Bennett's English-cut suit at a 1964 performance he said that was the style of suit he decided to make.

The workers in his factory are specialized in making a part of the suit – the pockets, shoulders, lapels etc., Myles said. "All the suits are cut by hand, one by one, and the lining, sleeves, and shoulder are all set by hand."

"We're not considered a major manufacturer. We're considered a large tailor shop. The maximum we can make is 400 suits a week, but I still sell every major store in the world."

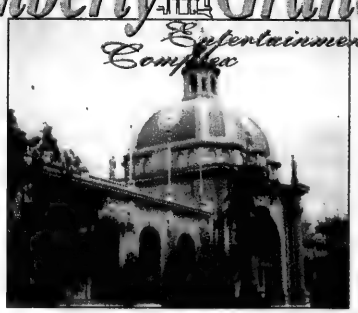
Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex



Standing majestically at Toronto's downtown lakefront, the Liberty Grand is the crown jewel of Exhibition Place. Originally constructed in 1926, this building has an impressive heritage. Not only have we recaptured the original features but we've restored the 1920's splendor and status as one of the city's finest.

Gracefully blending the exuberant Beaux Arts monumentality of the exterior with the classical interior finishes, you will enjoy the epitome of luxury and elegance. Dedicated to the highest standard of hospitality, the Liberty Grand offers the ultimate experience in customer service. This magnificent complex exudes an ambiance of style and refined beauty unparalleled in Toronto.

When it comes to surpassing expectations, the Liberty Entertainment Group takes pride in having perfected this art as a tradition.

Flowers make a room sing

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

With flowers, you can easily transform an ordinary room into something extraordinary, says Bob Hatcher of Hatcher Florists (221-5557).

To liven up a casual party "grab six or seven of your favourite bud vases, and in them place three to five fully open osiana or peckoubou roses in ivory pink or flamingo pink. Scatter the vases around the house and enjoy their fragrance and colour."

A grouping of four or five bud vases looks elegant when a single flower "such as a vibrant daisy or a fragrant freesia is placed in each vase with no added greenery or filler," he says.

In season, such as late summer, you can add seven to 15 stems of gladioli to "your tallest vase to make a simple but effective visual that will bring the eye to that part of the room.

"As well, you can get a bunch or two of curly willow – three or four-feet long twisted stems without foliage – and add it to the same vase."

In a rose bowl or round crystal vase, he says, place a dozen cut roses "so that their fully opened heads are bursting out of the mouth of the vase."

In a low bowl, you can place a block of oasis, and tie five to seven alstroemeria or roses with raffia so they make a floral topiary. The base can be hidden with open roses or Spanish moss, says Hatcher.

"All you need are a few well-placed floral arrangements around the room, and the room sings," he says.

At an elegant wedding, says Hatcher, more and more brides are carrying bouquets with the stems exposed and wrapped with ribbon.

"Picture a lovely bouquet of white calla lilies, encircled with white freesia and white gardenias, and then the stems wrapped with ribbon. Another elegant arrangement can be made by tying a large bouquet of open white polo roses and the stems together with white satin or velvet ribbon.

"Both bouquets would have matching hairpieces, the first with gardenias, freesia and white ribbon, and the other with white polo roses and matching ribbon from the bouquet."

Winter brides are carrying bouquets of terra cotta in cream and green, or a large posy bouquet made from clear ocean cream pink roses, reddish hypericum berries, rusty calla lilies, and green baruna spray orchids tied together with a large champagne coloured bow and ribbon, says Hatcher.

"A hairpiece of roses, orchids, hypericum and a bow top off the bridal ensemble."

PARTY PLANNER

Invitations give a sneak preview of your party

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Invitations give guests a sneak preview of the mood and tone of an event.

Darcia Moskaluk-Rutkay of Invitations by Design Inc. (416-789-7367) says that when guests receive an invitation with a funky font, casual wording and printed images, they realize that the event is not formal.

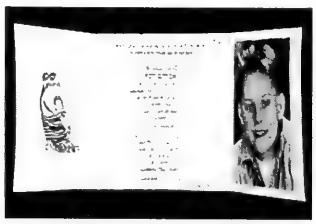
"A formal invitation is more rigid; the font is scripty or printed and there are no images. These invitations are usually printed on white or off-white stock with black ink," she says.

Invitations by Design Inc.

The colour scheme of the event, she says, can even be carried over to the invitations.

She advises clients to come in at least three months before the event. "Etiquette calls for the invitations to go out about six to eight weeks prior to the party – more than that is too much time – and they need time to read the proof."

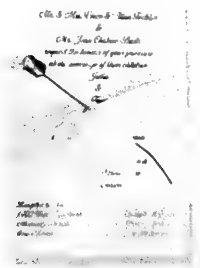
When clients do come in, they can view her gallery of work and either choose something they like, or have an invitation designed from scratch.



"We can also pick and choose – take the font from one invitation, apply it to a different card, or use the bow from another. The choices are endless," she says.

For one bat mitzvah, Moskaluk-Rutkay took baby pictures of the bat mitzvah girl and incorporated them into the invitation. "It was printed on different textured Japanese paper, engraved, accented with gold foil, and tied with a bow."

She can also do the calligraphy on the envelopes and supply the thank you and table cards. "Guests love photo tags as their table card, with a photo of the wedding couple or bar/bat mitzvah."



Aric Aragon of the Aragon Group (416-597-0777) says his philosophy is that an invitation is a window of what an event will be. "It's a teaser of your own event. A unique invitation can be your trademark."

A black tie event, he says, needs a glamorous, elegant invitation, "with a little whimsy. It gives people a guideline.

"Such an invitation could include a customized logo, and intertwined initials of the bride and groom. It is printed on ivory stock and topped with a satin bow."

He advises clients to stay away from over-sized invitations. "Size does not necessarily mean elegance and sophistication. It matters more what you present on the invitation – the way you lay it out and the words you use."

When a bat mitzvah girl came in and requested "a cool invitation, we designed a monogram of her initial and printed the invitation in chartreuse on white background. The card was closed with a gold seal."

If a family wants a personal touch on their invitation, he suggests incoporating a quote that would "speak of the family members' personality."

Aragon suggests visiting the invitation designer around the same time as the party planner and decorator so a theme can be developed. "An invitation can be predesigned before you are ready to have it sent out. It should reflect your whole event – it should not be a separate thing."

Dressing with heritage

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Heritage Clothing at 770 Lawrence Ave. W. (416-789-5192) is the place to shop for those people seeking well-priced executive and upper-end suits.

Your clothing budget will go farther at Heritage, says store president David Rosenberg.

"We don't have the expenses or the overhead of a downtown store. So basically we can offer you a boutique type of store with downtown labels at much more affordable prices."

The merchandise is priced well below their competitors, filling a special market niche, he says. "When we started the business, there was no one selling high-end clothing at popular prices. That's where Heritage has positioned itself. We're more label oriented now."

He says half the suits come from Italy and they're "all world-famous labels. We don't cut the label. We cut the price. They're at such a great price that the manufacturers of the labels have asked us not to mention their names."

The same Italian designer label suits that sell for $695 and $895 at Heritage, retail for $2,000 at other fine men's stores, he says.

Not only are prices good, but Heritage offers its customers a huge selection of clothing items to choose from, says Rosenberg. "We believe we have the best selection of men's clothing under one roof in the country.

"Instead of having 20 locations, we have one huge location only offering one-stop shopping" for business, formal, casual dress and accessories.

And Heritage has a huge inventory, he adds. "We don't have one or two of a size, we have 300 of a size."

The 22,000-square-foot store is built around the alteration department, comprised of five tailors, each with 30 years experience, Rosenberg says.

"A unique competitive advantage is that you meet the tailor who will do the alterations.

Heritage Clothing has a huge inventory to choose from.

"He does the pinning and the work on the premises... The garment is adjusted to get the custom-suit look."

Every single garment is checked for shatnez (mixed threads in clothing) by a rabbi, he says.

"In other words we sell strictly kosher suits. All Heritage suits, including tuxedos, are lined to the knee and made from cloths that conform to halachic specifications."

Tuxedos, which are all made of fine Italian wool, a very dressy wool, are trimmed with real satin on the lapels and have a special protective layer built in to absorb and camouflage perspiration, Rosenberg notes.

"Tuxedos which start at $595 are easily a $1,200 value. It's an incredible upper-end tux. For the price of three rentals you have a tuxedo forever."

Heritage carries a large assortment of black-tie accessories which include suspenders, cummerbund sets, pleated shirts with regular and wing-tipped collars. Formal vests are also available in a variety of patterns.

The shop carries a wide selection of expanded casual dress because of the trends in the market place, says Rosenberg.

"The demand has been for more casual clothes. But nothing says professionalism like a suit."

And in this regard, Casual Friday dress is losing some of its popularity, he says.

"People are not making the impression they used to because their customers are looking more professional than them. Because there's still a demand for casual dress we still address it. And that goes for both men's and lady's wear."

Rosenberg says running the business with his sister, Anita Rosenberg Gleberzon, is a key reason for Heritage Clothing's success. "We're a family business that cares.

"The family aspect distinguishes us from the competition. My father was in the menswear business for 50 years. He passed Heritage Clothing on to me and my sister. I hope we can pass it on to the next generation."

All you need for your party in one handy place

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Buying gifts and managing all the other details that make a successful party take up a lot of time. Some schlepping is unavoidable – you have to meet your caterer, among others, in person. And for anything a bit unusual, say, marzipan sculpture centrepieces, you have to consult a specialist.

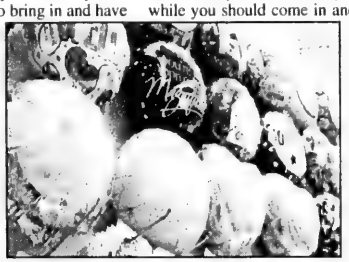
One way to minimize the schlepping, however, is to visit a one-stop supplier who has many of your needs under one roof. This is the premise on which David and Teri Leese of Loots (416-787-5668) and Howard Mandell of Party Packagers (416-631-8455 ext. 315) have built successful businesses.

Look for a supplier who stocks everything you need: tableware, toys, candy, balloons, stocking stuffers, favours. Don't be satisfied with breadth of selection either, Mandell warns. Look for depth – large quantities of any item.

This is partly because you may want to buy some gifts in quantity. Since school-age kids go to a lot of parties, parents need to provide gifts for their friends' parties as well as their own.

Depth also means that a supplier can offer bigger discounts, while making sure he doesn't run out of high-demand wares that customers are snapping up off his shelves. Consider this especially if you want imported items, which take longer to bring in and have higher shipping costs.

Insist on service as much as product, urges David Leese, who operates Loots as a partnership with his wife Teri. Owner-operated businesses have a stake in a high level of service to help them thrive despite having larger competitors, and the owner's presence makes it easier to keep the personal touch.



One-stop party shops, like Party Packagers, supply all your party needs.

A good supplier will offer something competitors don't duplicate. Mandell says, for example, that Party Packagers is Toronto's only party supplier that specializes in toys. They also do a lot of custom balloon work and rent helium tanks.

Until recently, Mandell recalls, both toy stores and party suppliers were small mom-and-pop businesses. Small toy stores took a beating from chain stores; this is now happening with party suppliers.

For long-term success, though, a larger operation still has to combine bulk-buying advantages with top-level service. Courtesies such as home delivery and gift wrapping save time and energy, for example.

Party Packagers provides a checklist to help you organize your purchases. Loots delivers anywhere, for any occasion. And while you should come in and look over the stock, ordering by phone, fax or the Net is a great convenience.

The personal touch in a smaller business may be exemplified in specialties like Loots' camp "care packages" (loot bags for overnight campers). They also do custom cakes and piñatas.

Loot bags can be cash and carry or customized, and can include candy, party favours, toys, dolls and action figures. But look for inventiveness in this area. One Loots bag with a science theme contained magnets with a how-to book, dinosaur candy, disappearing ink, a gyroscope and stuff like silly putty, called "ooze." Others might contain makeup kits, model kits or decorating materials.

Loots can work on short notice – the same day for pickup and delivery. For a cake, though, call on the Wednesday before the weekend you need it. Party Packagers recommends placing custom balloon orders 10 days to two weeks ahead.

Among the major services your supplier should offer, Mandell and Leese both list good advice on products and their use. The staff should be product experts. Parents want things to be safe, kids want them to be "cool," and the suppliers must satisfy both.

Also, the suppliers should be networking with other party professionals and able to recommend them to you. If the recommendations turn out well, it redounds to the credit of both parties.

For you to trust your supplier, he has to come through when you need him.

"One disappointment can alienate a client," Leese says, and he wants "one-stop customers, not one-time." Ultimately, his success is built on your trust.

An Israeli bar-mitzvah

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Brian Ginsberg, 13, celebrated his bar mitzvah at Masada, the site of the ancient, Judean mountain-top city where the Jewish inhabitants, under siege for nine months in the first century CE, chose mass suicide over surrendering to Rome.

Having the bar mitzvah ceremony at Masada was very moving, said Sheri Ginsberg, Brian's mother. "You're there, in this historic spot on this mountain overlooking Israel and you really feel connected to your ancestors. The moment had a lot of meaning ... it transcends the whole experience of the bar mitzvah.

"You can't help but be moved when you're sitting on the same stone benches that have been there for 2,000 years.

"Brian was very moved. He said, 'I went up the mountain a boy and I came down a man.'"

The Ginsbergs travelled to Israel with several other families last December in time for the new millennium. The bar mitzvah package included a tour of Israel along with the mountain top service.

Five of the group were called to the Torah at Masada, and five other young people had aliyahs, she said, explaining that the tour guide connected the families to an Israeli rabbi, who sent them their portions to study in Toronto – they were all given parts of the same parshah – and then the rabbi conducted the service at Masada.

"We enjoyed every single moment of the trip," said Ginsberg. "Our tour guide Ezra was extraordinary."

Stanley Morais, sales and marketing manager of the El Al Tourist Office, says there's been a huge increase in travel to Israel since El Al introduced its new bar/bat mitzvah rate two years ago.

Those youth who are celebrating bar/bat mitzvahs get a reduction in the airfare, he said. "The range of reduction is between 50 and 25 percent off published adult fares."

In the summer they can save as much as $500 to $600, he noted. "We want to encourage them to have the bar/bat in Israel... We're trying to make it easy for the Canadian Jewish community to have an Israel experience and we're there to help."

'El Al is the only kosher airline'

El Al supplies air only, he said. "Travel agents can set up the [bar/bat mitzvah] program or people can do things on their own."

Frances Bigman of Aufgang Travel, a Toronto travel agency that organizes many bar/bat mitzvah tours gave a very rough estimate of the cost of the bar mitzvah package. She said a "fully-loaded tour" – with a guide, chaperon, and bar/bat mitzvah – for a family of three (two adults and a child) would start at $10,000; the land cost (airfare is extra) for a fully-loaded tour for a family with three children starts at $9,000 (US) for two weeks.

Morais said he believes that the bar-mitzvah experience is enhanced when they fly El Al. "They're going on the national carrier. They'll remember the time they spent on the plane."

El Al is the only kosher airline, he said, adding that many observant people travel on El Al and so there is often a minyan on the plane.

He noted that El Al is known for its safety on both mechanical and security matters. "That's an issue that we don't compromise on. El Al spends a considerable amount of dollars on safety and security in comparison to other airlines... It is the focus of the work that we do."

He said he's received very positive feedback from customers about the improved in-flight service on El Al. "People who are flying with us are happy with the service. We have 5,000 members of our frequent flier program."

PARTY PLANNER

From towels to bedding and more...

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

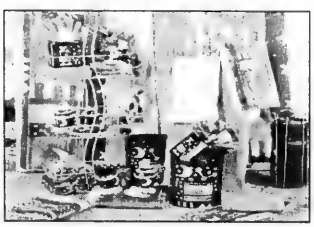
When a young married couple sets up a house they need many items to make their new abode comfortable.

One way of helping a bride and groom feather their nest is to set up a gift registry at Deblins. One of the largest linen retailers in Toronto, Deblins (782-2910) carries everything from towels and bathroom accessories to bedding and tablecloths. The company has three stores in the GTA – 39 Orfus Rd. in North York; 7979 Weston Rd. at Highway 7 in Woodbridge and 2575 Dundas St. W., in Mississauga.

"We probably have the biggest collection of table linen in the city," says owner Ellis Chitiz.

A popular line is Visa tablecloths, he says. "They're stain-proof and require no ironing. They come in patterns and solids."

Deblins offers a huge selection in a range of products, Chitiz says.



"We have 96 bedding designs, 200 shower curtain designs, 56 different colour solid towels, a large collection of embellished and printed towels, a full range of synthetic and down duvets and 10 different styles of pillows."

The newly installed computerized bridal registry service makes gift giving very easy, says Chitiz. Popular registry items also include towels and bathroom accessories, he adds.

"Most of our shower curtains have matching towels and bath accessories."

As for bedding, Deblins carries full ensembles with matching sheets, comforters, duvet covers, bed skirts, shams, window valences, rod pockets sets and offers a full range of custom work.

Deblins also has a large collection of iron and wooden beds and also stocks extra deep-fitted sheets, Chitiz says. "It's hard to find sheets to fit new mattresses. We also carry Kingsdown mattresses... They only sell to higher end stores."

Established in Toronto 23 years ago, Deblins is named for Chitiz's mother Debbie and the word linens. His father, the late Louis Chitiz, and his mother ran a linen business in South Africa for 40 years.

When they came to Toronto, they started with a small store in the Sheraton Centre selling tablecloths made in China to American tourists.

They extended their line to include table linen from Israel, Italy, Germany, France, the United States and Canada, opening a second store in the Eaton Centre.

The Chitizes added towels and bedding when they opened new stores on Bloor Street and the Promenade Mall in Thornhill.

Over the years they added the larger stores and closed the smaller stores, Chitiz, now the sole owner of the company explains.

"We do three times the amount of business with three than with six stores. We offer a far bigger selection working on smaller markup due to a much lower overhead."

As for Debbie Chitiz, now 77 – she's known as Mrs. C in the industry – she left Deblins five years ago and now she's selling indoor and outdoor upscale furniture at her new store, Indoor and Out, in the Yonge and Davisville area.

"She retired for 15 minutes," says her son. "She had to get back into business. She's a hard worker. She only carries quality."

And quality is the name of the game at Deblins, he says. "Everything you need for the home is at Deblins at a better price. We offer boutique quality at warehouse prices."

CIC holds gov't. to account

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) is holding the federal government to an earlier commitment that Ottawa will tread very carefully from now on when it comes to anti-Israel resolutions at the United Nations.

The CIC's renewed concern came after a front-page National Post story last Friday, which accused Canada of backing a series of fresh UN resolutions opposed by Israel.

National Post* story on Canada's UN vote downplayed

While the CIC is on heightened awareness, especially in the aftermath of Canada's support last month for UN Security Council Resolution 1322, which condemned the Jewish state for excessive use of force against Palestinians, it is putting little stock in other aspects of the Post story.

The article, headlined "Canada Fighting Israel at UN," said Ottawa has backed several "new" anti-Israel measures at the world body, despite the recent backlash against the Liberals for Canada's support for Resolution 1322.

The story stated that Canada has supported 10 of 12 draft resolutions opposed by Israel and the United States, "[which] contain language certain to give offence to many in the Jewish Diaspora."

Comment

By any conventional standards, Israel is winning this latest war with the Palestinians. Despite horrific terrorist attacks and daily doses of choreographed violence, Israel's borders have not shifted. The country remains secure. Most Israelis conduct their daily business uninterrupted, doing what the rest of us in the West do, waking and sleeping, working and studying.

And yet, from here in North America, Israel seems to be losing. Israel's image is being battered daily. And Jews in the Diaspora feel attacked.

The whole situation seems Orwellian. A dovish Israeli prime minister offers sweeping concessions. An aging, corrupt Arab despot rejects the offer and calls for blood. Young children are used as human shields and political pawns – violating international law and basic human decency. A blood-curdling cry for war against the Jews echoes from mosques all over the world. Yet Israel is branded the obstacle to peace.

Of course, the situation is more complicated. Palestinian frustrations have been building for years. The peace process itself now seems to have taken place among the leaders but not between the peoples.

Still, it is odd that the picture remains so unbalanced. Clearly, the Palestinians have learned to master the media game. A full-page ad in the New York Times lists the Palestinian dead, by name and age, in the background. In the foreground, bold letters transform these peace rejectionists into all-American heroes. Echoing America's Declaration of Independence, the ad intones: "They All Died in the Pursuit of Liberty and Independence."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Solidarity Missions

TORONTO — United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC) is subsidizing a young leadership solidarity mission to Israel, from Jan. 8 to 14. The mission is being undertaken in partnership with a United Jewish Communities Young Leadership mission. Cost is $1,100, and application deadline is Dec. 8. UIAFC is also sponsoring a Canadian women's solidarity and learning mission to Israel from March 4 to 13.

Chapters' Donation

TORONTO — Chapters Bookstores last week presented a $50,000 cheque to B'nai Brith Canada to establish a special endowment fund to be used for Holocaust educational programs and initiatives. Chapters' donation was from the sales of 10,000 copies of The Holocaust Chronicle: A History in Words and Pictures, a special book launched last May. The chain committed $5 from each book sold as a donation to BBC.

ISRAEL

Red Cross Rumour

JERUSALEM — The International Red Cross is denying reports that it is helping Israel and Hezbollah negotiate a prisoner exchange, the Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported. The organization's spokesperson in Israel was responding to remarks by the Hezbollah secretary general that the Red Cross is serving as a mediator after Israel reportedly rejected offers from Spain, Germany and Russia to try to negotiate the release of three Israeli soldiers and a civilian held by the Shi'ite group in Lebanon.

Bibi Would Win

JERUSALEM — If an election were held today, former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu would defeat Prime Minister Ehud Barak by nearly 20 percentage points, a Gallup poll in the Israeli newspaper Ma'ariv showed.

Arafat's Message

JERUSALEM — In a videotaped message broadcast last week on Israeli television, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat said the Palestinians are determined to continue the peace process. His message was not broadcast on Palestinian television.

WORLD

Insurance Settlement

ROME — An agreement to pay out $100 million in insurance claims and humanitarian assistance to Holocaust survivors has been finalized between the Italian insurance company Assicurazioni Generali and the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims. Settlements with other insurance companies that are part of the commission's mandate are said to be nearing conclusion.

240th Anniversary

LONDON — Britain's central Jewish organization celebrated its 240th birthday last week. The Board of Deputies of British Jews was formed in 1760, the year King George III assumed the throne.

Official Apologizes

MOSCOW — The newly elected governor of the Kursk region in central Russia publicly apologized for anti-Semitic statements he made this month, when he lashed out at a "Russian-Jewish conspiracy." Alexander Mikhailov apologized after he met with a representative of Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Helping Palestinians

GROZNY — Chechen warlords are considering assisting the Palestinians in the ongoing conflict with the Israelis, according to the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews and the Russian security service. The commander of an Islamic brigade in Chechnya reportedly said in a recently intercepted telephone conversation, "It is necessary that all true believers rise to fight the Jews."

Yahoo! Ruling

PARIS — A Paris judge reaffirmed an earlier ruling that the U.S. Internet portal Yahoo! must prevent access in France to auctions in which Nazi memorabilia are available for purchase. The ruling, while expected, strengthens the growing movement to set laws and limits to what goes on over the Internet, particularly when it comes to the spread of hate-based information and materials.

Oprah Feted

CHICAGO — The Chicago region of the American Committee for the Weizmann Institute of Science saluted talk show queen Oprah Winfrey at a gala dinner here last month. The Weizmann Institute is creating the Oprah Winfrey Fund for Biomedical Research, which will support research into several diseases, as well as on women's health.

Slave Labour Compensation to be Tax Exempt

OTTAWA — In a letter to Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA, formerly Revenue Canada) released its decision on the application of the Income Tax Act to German slave and forced labour restitution payments to Holocaust survivors.

According to the CCRA, compensation payments under the $5-billion (US) slave and forced labour fund created by Germany last July are considered payments described in the Income Tax Act. Thus, compensation received by a Canadian taxpayer who is an eligible Holocaust survivor, or who is receiving such compensation in respect of a survivor, is exempt from income tax in Canada. Nor is there any tax payable to Germany.

Distribution of application forms for former Nazi-era slaves will take place next month. Heirs of survivors who died after Feb. 16, 1999 will be eligible to receive the compensation.

In a separate development, the New York-based Claims Conference says that a provisional agreement on the restitution of Jewish assets has been signed by the government of the Netherlands and Dutch financial organizations, totalling $325 million.

New joint effort to simplify restitution process

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For decades, Holocaust survivors seeking restitution and reparation payments have faced a complex, bureaucratic process marked by underfunded, overlapping agencies, application forms and confusing types of funds.

Much of that activity has taken place over the past four years. Worldwide since 1996, an estimated $9 billion has been exacted from Germany, Switzerland and other countries, in compensation for Nazi evils.

But accompanying these successes has been a cacophony of voices, all competing to be survivors' advocates.

Now, a co-operative effort between several groups has been formed to streamline and simplify the process in Canada.

Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada is spearheading a partnership with United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC), the United Restitution Organization (URO), and the New York-based Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference) to gather data on all restitution matters and help the estimated 15,000 to 20,000 survivors in this country wade through the complicated issues and forms.

Among the goals are to set up an up-to-date databank on survivors in Canada, as well as a central, toll-free telephone line that will answer questions on applications, payments and funds.

While the initiative is expected to take pressure off the overworked and understaffed URO offices in Toronto and Montreal, which have handled claims from Canada for years, it is not the new group's goal to replace URO, said Michael Rosenberg, acting president of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada.

"They are paid professionals, we are volunteers," Rosenberg said. "We want to be an organization that will help survivors administratively and morally with all their problems."

The group, whatever form it will take, will be administered by a soon-to-be elected board of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada, which was set up in 1998 partly out of a sense of frustration that restitution issues facing survivors were not being adequately addressed.

The survivors group has mailed out letters to members at large, asking for nominations for a 20-member executive, half of which will be split evenly between Toronto and Montreal residents.

A top priority of the new effort, Rosenberg noted, will be compensation for former Nazi-era slave labourers.

In July, the German government and German industries announced a $5.2 billion (US) fund to compensate over one million wartime slave and forced labourers. Forced labourers were mainly non-Jewish civilians who were seconded to work on farms and infrastructure. Slaves were Jews who were often worked to death in Nazi factories and concentration camp-like conditions.

Thousands of survivors in Canada are believed eligible for compensation for their slave labour. They are entitled to roughly $10,000 each.

Time is of the essence. Since its inception, Rosenberg pointed out, two founding members of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada, Robert Engel and Ralph Snow, have died.

URO has agreed to help survivors complete their slave labour forms at no cost, Rosenberg added.

According to Perry Romberg, director of planning and community services at UIAFC's Toronto headquarters, application forms for slave labour compensation will be issued in mid- to late December, and promise to be short and simple.

However, Romberg stressed, survivors who have been receiving compensation, whether German pensions or payments under the so-called Article 2, or Hardship Fund, will not need to fill out separate forms for slave labour.

Those recipients, he explained, are already in a computer data bank, and all they need to do is complete a simple form that asks for names, addresses, and place and dates of enslavement.

In August, the Wiedergutmachung, the office that administers German compensation, mailed notices and forms to current recipients of pensions only, asking whether they are eligible for slave labour payments. Romberg says some 3,000 applications from Canada have been returned.

Article 2 Fund recipients who believe they are eligible for slave labour compensation received their forms only recently.

The new community effort will also look at the $1.25 billion settlement from Swiss banks, made in 1998 but which has yet to be distributed. Of that amount, $200 million was set aside in a humanitarian fund for needy survivors worldwide.

In Canada, $3.7 million (Cdn) was distributed to 7,091 survivors with immediate financial needs, for an average payout of $521. Many thousands of late claims were received.

Only in Israel

Three weeks ago, as a guest of El Al Airlines and the Israeli Ministry of Tourism, I spent four days touring Israel. This article is the last in a three-part series describing some of the highlights of that visit.

* * *

From the editor's desk

On my third day touring in Israel, Elie, my guide, and I set out early in the clear crisp air and dazzling sunshine of Jerusalem and headed westward and northward to the Sharon coastal plain.

Along the way, in the gently sloping green foothills that mark the transition from the Judean mountains to the coastal plain, we pulled into a gas station to fill up the tank.

The tone of the pleasant day that unfolded was set for us as we settled alongside the diesel fuel bay.

No sooner had Elie parked the car and shut the engine than the gas attendant came bounding out of the station to serve us. He wore the distinctive white crocheted kippah of the followers of the legendary Nachman of Bratslav. He had a youthful, unevenly distributed beard and long curlicue ringlets that fell from the top of his sideburns to his shoulders, almost touching his shirt collar. His name was Kalafati.

He greeted us with an effusive shalom and a welcoming, friendly smile.

While he poured the diesel fuel into the tank of the van, we had time enough to converse about the essentials of his life. Kalafati was born in Tunisia; most of his family, however, now lives in Paris. In Paris, he was a successful merchant. But to meet the spiritual needs he felt his Parisian lifestyle could not satisfy, he and his wife moved to Israel some years ago.

All too quickly, the tank could hold no more fuel and we had to end our friendly discussion. Other cars were waiting their turn behind us, and Israeli drivers, not known for their patience behind the wheel, were already waving us away and gesticulating their entitlement to take our place at the pump.

We had to leave.

As Elie steered the car toward the highway and I rolled up the window to protect the precious air conditioning against the encroaching heat of the day, Kalafati invoked upon us God's blessing for a long, prosperous life, for peace in Israel and for the possibility of a reunion some day in our future.

Elie finally pulled away from the bay and headed back onto the main road to continue our descent toward the sea. I smiled as I thought about the sheer Israeliness of the exchange that had just taken place: a gas station attendant born in Tunisia, a disciple of Nachman of Bratslav, who lies buried in the Ukraine, speaking French and Hebrew to a tour guide born in Algeria and a tour guest born in Toronto.

We understood each other very well, and only in small part because of the common languages. But this could have only happened in Israel.

Our next stop, some 30 minutes later, was on the Mediterranean Ocean at Kibbutz Sdot Yam.

Sdot Yam was the home of Hannah Senesh, the young poet, a visionary, idealistic Palestinian Jew (before the creation of Israel in 1948, the Jews were regarded as Palestinians by the rest of the world) who parachuted behind Nazi lines in Europe to try to help bring her fellow Jews to safety.

Alas, as we all know, she was captured, tortured and murdered by the Nazis. But her poetry is still read today and her humanitarianism and courage are an example of the highest, best values worth emulating.

But our "mission" at Sdot Yam was to climb into a motorized rubber dingy and enjoy Kef Yam, meaning literally, fun in the sea.

Dan was our boatswain, a tall, trim caricature of a man, the sun permanently shaded into his face. He sported a large grey-white Vandyke beard. His hair was wildly overgrown. The sun, wind, salty ocean spray and time turned it to grey, although evidence of an earlier gingi-red still dappled its unruly tips. He explained the significance of what we saw on the shore: the Roman aqueduct, the amphitheatre, and the archeological ruins.

From our vantage in our open-air boat bobbing some 300 metres away from the very same coastline that emerged from the early morning mist to greet the ancient Romans and Phoenicians, and more recently, sanctuary-seeking Jewish refugees, our view of time and history changed. We could almost touch it.

From Sdot Yam, we travelled to the Binyamina winery and visited with its sage, veteran vintner Amram Susarsky. He was one of the early graduates from the food engineering program at the Technion in Haifa. Wine and its secrets have comprised his entire professional life. His laboratory/office/interview room was a fascinating chamber of personal and professional oenological memorabilia.

In between samples from five different offerings of the Binyamina winery, he answered every question I could think to ask about himself and wine-making. In the process, he provided me with a mini-seminar on the history of Israel's wine industry.

My short visit to Israel ended the following day. In four short days, I had been reminded, again, of how much there is to see in Israel. I saw so much, though sadly, very few Jewish tourists.

Local Jewish-Arab relations feel strain of conflict

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The current Palestinian uprising in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip has embittered Jewish-Arab relations in Canada, according to leaders in both communities.

Jewish and Arab spokespersons agree that the relationship has deteriorated since the breakdown of the seven-year Oslo peace process and the fighting in the region that has claimed scores of lives.

They do, however, want to keep the lines of communication open and rebuild broken bridges so that they can once again focus on issues of common concern, such as government funding of private schools.

"Right now, the relationship is frozen," said Moshe Ronen, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said that "there is little basis now for a constructive dialogue." Frank Dimant, executive director of B'nai Brith, noted similarly, "We're in a frozen, suspended state."

"To some degree," said Manuel Prutschi, Congress' national director of community relations, "there has been a loss of mutual trust. Both sides operate within a larger context. Events [in the Middle East] affect us deeply."

Erez Anzel, president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, said that mutual animosity is the order of the day. "The communities are like two people yelling at each other and not trying to understand each other."

Meanwhile, John Asfour, president of the Canadian Arab Federation, described relations as "very tense" and Rashad Saleh, general director of Palestine House, characterized them as "very cold," like those between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

"The relationship is strained," said Atif Kubursi, president of the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations.

According to Jewish spokespersons, the cause of the deterioration is directly connected to two factors.

Firstly, they say, Palestine House and the Canadian Arab Federation organized or encouraged incendiary anti-Israel rallies during which Israel was compared to Nazi Germany, Ehud Barak was likened to Adolf Hitler and the Star of David to the swastika, and chants of "death to Jews" could be heard.

Secondly, they add, they feel disappointed that Arab leaders have not sufficiently denounced anti-Semitic vandalism against synagogues and Jewish institutions across Canada of late. The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada has recorded 47 such incidents since October.

In a reference to the vehement atmosphere at Arab anti-Israel rallies, Prutschi said, "We discussed these matters with Palestine House and the Canadian Arab Federation and expressed our concerns about the rhetoric. Despite the passions, we have a responsibility as Canadians to keep the level of discourse civilized. There was agreement on that point."

Decrying the lack of a vigorous Arab response to anti-Semitism, he complained that Arab leaders have not condemned "every act of anti-Semitism here. We expected that." When Palestine House was vandalized, he explained, Congress "came out with a very strong, specific denunciation of that incident."

Ronen said that Arab leaders did not call him after a rash of anti-Semitic incidents. "The response was silence, and that was very discouraging."

Asfour, accusing the Israeli army of killing Palestinian children, said that he could not understand why a delegation of Canadian Jews visiting Israel recently had not paid condolences to grieving Palestinian families. "It hurts me to see those children dying and being killed. Israeli leaders have to understand that Palestinian land is occupied and can't be occupied forever."

Jehad al-Iweiwi, executive director of the Canadian Arab Federation, suggested that Arabs in Canada feel betrayed. "It breaks our heart that the Jewish community endorses what Israel has done to the Palestinians."

Asked about Nazi symbolism at Arab rallies, he replied that demonstrations are difficult to control. Condemning anti-Semitic vandalism as "un-Canadian," he called it an "abomination."

Shawky Fahel, former vice-president of Palestine House and a member of the Canadian Arab Business Council, said that during moments of emotional upheaval, hotheads come to the fore. "I, for one, condemn all acts of anti-Semitism. We're all Canadians."

Kubursi urged Jews not to judge the Arab community by its extremists. "These people are an embarrassment to us. It's not a religious, but a political fight."

Justifying the comparison between Israel and Nazi Germany, Saleh claimed that Israel's closure of the territories was akin to Germany's establishment of concentration camps. "We're not comparing Jews to Nazis. We try to explain that not every Jew supports Israel's policies."

Looking beyond the current troubles, Prutschi said that Jews and Arabs are perfectly capable of repairing their frayed ties and working together on issues of common interest from government financing of parochial schools to the plight of Muslims in Kosovo. "The opportunity is there for a resumption of good, neighbourly relations."

"We don't have to embrace them as brothers, but there is a need to engage them constructively," said Landy.

Adopting a similar line, Dimant said, "I'm optimistic that when things in Israel settle down, efforts will be made to rebuild bridges."

Fahel said, "I'm an advocate of keeping the lines open, no matter how bad things are. We have to reach out to each other. The Moshe Ronens and the Rashad Saleh's should get together."

Reflecting on what the future may bring, Saleh said, "We hope that the situation in Palestine will improve soon and that we can resume our relations in Canada."

Israel should remain on Golan Heights, says leader of Israeli settlers' group

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel should not withdraw from the Golan Heights, even if Syria is willing to normalize relations and sign a formal peace treaty with Israel, an Israeli settler says.

"There are no circumstances under which the Golan should be given up," declared Marla Van Meter – a Golan resident since 1983 – in an interview last week.

Van Meter, who lives on Kibbutz Afiq with her family, is the English spokesperson of the Golan Residents Committee, which holds that this strategic sliver of land should permanently remain a sovereign part of Israel.

In her view, a withdrawal from the Golan, captured by the Israeli army during the 1967 Six Day War, would be "short-sighted and dangerous."

The status quo, she argued, has kept the peace on the Golan, annexed by Israel in 1981, since at least the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Van Meter, originally from Santa Maria, California, claimed that since the Golan comprises less than one percent of Syria's territory, Syria will eventually resign itself to its loss, just as it has accepted the 1938 Turkish occupation of Hatay, one of its provinces.

"Syria doesn't neeed the Golan," said Van Meter, who was here under the auspices of B'nai Brith after attending the annual meeting of the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in Chicago.

"The day a Syrian leader is willing to make peace with Israel is the day the question of land won't be important."

She believes that the basis of an agreement between Israel and Syria should be peace for peace. In the meantime, Israel should keep open its lines of communication with Syria. "We all want peace, dialogue and negotiation."

Van Meter, the manager of Kibbutz Afiq's public gardens, cast doubt on Syria's interest in achieving a settlement with Israel. In talks last winter under the auspices of the United States, the Israeli government offered Syria all but a small corner of the Golan in exchange for peace, yet Syria rejected the deal.

Marla Van Meter

She said that a peace agreement with Israel would threaten the Syrian regime's legitimacy.

Like his late father Hafez, who died last June after a long illness, Syrian President Bashar al-Assad has adopted the same dogmatic approach to Israel, she observed. "He is a carbon copy of his father. It will be a long time coming before Bashar is interested in talking to Israel."

She added, "If Bashar is really interested in peace, he will be looking at a peace based on open borders, trade and diplomatic relations, not on a tiny piece of land. Bashar only wants the Golan, not peace."

Van Meter said that public opinion surveys in Israel suggest that the majority of Israelis oppose a pullback from the Golan. "The government must listen to the people of Israel."

The Golan, with 33 Jewish settlements and a population of 35,000, including 18,000 Jews and 17,000 Druze in four villages near Mount Hermon, is strategically vital to Israel, she said.

With its early warning stations and military bases, it serves as a buffer zone with Syria and furnishes Israelis with one-third of their water supply.

Van Meter said she and other settlers were shocked when the late Yitzhak Rabin, for whom she voted in the 1992 general election, subsequently placed the Golan on the negotiating table.

"This forever changed our lives," she explained. "Our lives will hang in the balance as long as we have leaders willing to relinquish the Golan."

Its loss, she warned, would be devastating, in part because Israel's security would be dependent on an international peacekeeping force. "This would weaken Israel."

Van Meter – whose brother Solon Rosenblatt fought on Mount Hermon as an Israeli paratrooper in the Yom Kippur War – fulfilled a dream by settling on the Golan. Coming from an ardent Zionist family, she visited the Golan for the first time in 1977, when she was a javelin thrower on the U.S. Maccabiah team.

She and her husband, Dennis, a fellow Californian who manages the kibbutz's subtropical orchards, have two teenaged children, Kinneret and Golan. Her sister is a teacher at Haifa University, but her brother has since returned to the United States.

Van Meter, who supported the Likud in last year's Israeli election, was asked if she'd live on the Golan under Syrian sovereignty.

"In 1995, Hafez Assad told Dennis Ross – a U.S. peace envoy – that he didn't want Jewish settlers on the Golan. That's not an option. They don't want us there."

Van Meter said that Israel's unilateral pull-out from southern Lebanon last May was carried out too hastily and made Israel look weak.

"Compromise and flexibility are regarded as weakness by the Arabs."

Powerful benefits in volatile markets

By Jonathan Kirshblum

Segregated funds will again command much attention over the coming weeks. Briefly, segregated funds are similar to mutual funds and are offered by insurance companies. Their wide appeal among many investors is due to the varying degrees of "insurance-like" benefits offered.

For example, segregated funds may offer creditor protection. This has great appeal to lawyers, doctors, self-employed individuals, and anyone else concerned about protecting personal investment assets in the event of a lawsuit.

Segregated fund investors name a beneficiary. Upon death, settlement is paid directly to the beneficiary, bypassing the estate and avoiding probate and associated legal fees. This has appeal for the estate planning investor.

Two years ago the segregated fund market exploded with new business. Insurance companies began competing on how much they would offer segregated fund investors in the form of valuable insurance benefits, at the least additional cost.

Principal Guarantee

In the past, segregated funds offered investors a 75 per cent principal guarantee at the end of a 10-year period, or upon death. Two years ago some companies raised these guarantees to 100 per cent.

A 10-year principal guarantee may sound comforting, but is it worth an added expense? Analyzing the performance of most equity mutual funds over any isolated decade will show that very few had negative returns. Paying even a little extra for a guarantee that is likely unnecessary lacks appeal.

In contrast, a 100 per cent principal guarantee as a death benefit can be extremely valuable for seniors or anyone considering estate planning. These investors, with money earmarked for heirs, and who might ordinarily avoid the equity markets due to risk, now have the best of both worlds: access to growth potential, with a safety net.

Segregated funds can be sold at any time at prevailing market prices. Many seniors choose this investment for growth exposure because it performs like any other equity investment during their lifetime, and carries valuable guarantees in case of death.

Locking-in Gains

Some companies offer lock-in features, so that as a fund's value increases (during market upswings), investors can repeatedly lock-in growth.

Using this option repeatedly could conceivably result in the beneficiary receiving the highest value ever achieved in the fund.

The highest locked-in value is guaranteed even if market prices later decline.

In November 1998, one of my clients, a woman in her eighties, had $350K invested in risk-free Treasury bills, earmarked for her son. She would never have invested this money in the stock market for fear of potential loss.

A 100 per cent principal guarantee afforded her the peace of mind to comfortably invest in an equity-segregated fund; the lock-in feature provided an opportunity to protect any growth. She passed away a few weeks ago. Her beneficiary received a probate-free cheque seven days after her death for approximately $960K.

The fund had Nortel, JDS, and BCE in its top 10 holdings. It is important to note that even if my client's passing had occurred after the recent market downturn, or more specifically Nortel's price meltdown, her son would still have received a cheque for $960K.

Competition to attract new business culminated in one insurance company offering a 100 per cent principal guarantee, unlimited lock-ins, and purchase to annuitants (the life used for determining the death benefit) up to age 90. This combination of benefits provided my client with the ideal investment solution.

People Of Any Age Can Benefit

In most situations it is a senior that invests their own money and names their child beneficiary, such as the case with my client. However, people of any age can invest in a segregated fund, name themselves beneficiary, utilize the lock-ins, and link the term and guarantees of the investment to the lifetime of someone older. In the case of my client, the son could also have capitalized on the same strategy using his own money.

Benefits Under Review

For some time, and especially with recent market volatility, 100 per cent guarantees have come under the scrutiny of OSFI (Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions). OSFI is a federal agency that monitors the reserve structure of insurance companies.

It ensures that sufficient funds are maintained in reserves to settle contractual obligations.

OSFI, with the guidance of the Canadian Institute of Actuaries, is directing insurance companies to adopt a factor-based approach to calculating reserve requirements.

Companies offering 100 per cent death benefit guarantees, lock-in features, and the choice of volatile funds, can be attractive for the investor, but risky for the insurer. The new OSFI mandate stipulates that the greater the volatility of the fund, the greater the reserve requirements.

Changes Afoot

Segregated fund benefits and costs are now under review by insurance companies. In most cases segregated fund MERs (management expense ratios - which include the yearly insurance cost) are going to rise to offset the expense of the benefits being offered.

Many companies are electing to scale back the guarantees, reduce or eliminate the number of lock-ins, and reduce the maximum age allowed for annuitants.

The company that offered the 100 per cent guarantee, unlimited lock-ins, and availability to age 90 currently still offers the 100 per cent guarantee, but, has reduced the unlimited lock-ins to six per year, and does not accept new purchases with annuitants over age 80.

These terms are still very attractive, but will soon be replaced by even lesser benefits.

Time Of The Essence

Investors who already own segregated funds will continue to enjoy the benefits written into their contracts, notwithstanding increases in MERs. These increases will take effect in the New Year.

Investors considering the purchase of a segregated fund for the first time should seek professional advice. New segregated funds with less favourable terms are already replacing funds of the past that had excellent benefits.

Therefore, time is of the essence. If you think this investment strategy might suit your needs, contact an expert who has knowledge of all the companies and funds, which may still have the terms most favourable to you.

Disheartening, surreal, sad and immoral

One of the most distressing aspects of the Palestinians' ongoing campaign of violence and propaganda against Israel has been the response of the western world. Palestinians and their advocates attempt to rid Jerusalem of any link to its Jewish history, yet the West remains silent. The Palestinian educational system teaches young children to hate and to murder Jews, even as Palestinian clerics urge their worshippers to kill Jews, yet the West remains silent.

As noted writer and essayist Cynthia Ozick recently pointed out in an article in the Wall Street Journal, the de-Judaization of Jerusalem is also its de-Christianization. "If Judaism has no roots in Jerusalem, then Christianity was never born…" Yet no mainstream Christian authority has stepped forward to challenge this latest tawdry tactic by the Palestinians.

Nor has any mainstream Christian authority stepped forward to condemn the hate-based, hate-filled pedagogy of the Palestinians or the "religious" exhortations to kill Jews.

The disconnect between the response that was reasonably, minimally, expected from the West and the silence that has, instead, been its response, has been as painful as it has been incomprehensible.

Last weekend, a different though related disconnect appeared in the Saturday Globe and Mail. Under a bold, one-inch headline "Unveiling Iran," an entire page was dedicated in the Travel Section to encouraging tourists to visit Iran. The article written special to the Globe and Mail by Cam McGrath, innocuously makes the point: "In Tehran, once a canvas for official anti-West graffiti, the epithets and slogans on the sides of buildings are slowly fading away, not to be replaced. The small overtures bespeak a new Iran, an Iran under the progressive leadership of President Mohammad Khatami…" (Our emphasis)

There is absolutely no evidence for McGrath's frilly conclusion that "As hardliners make way for moderates, and mullahs yield to literates, Iran warms to the West." In fact, the evidence is to the contrary.

Iran is where Jews are harassed, live in constant fear for their safety and never know whether, at any moment, they will be charged with a fictitious crime and convicted in a pre-arranged phony trial. Iran is where the leaders fund, train, support and dispatch Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad to strike at Israel and other western targets. Iran is where the religious establishment constantly, relentlessly, calls for the destruction and annihilation of Israel and its people.

And yet, as if this aspect of "progressive" Iran were nothing more than a minor, inconvenient detail, the travel writer urges us all to visit there, spend our money and just have ourselves some plain old fun.

The disconnect is disheartening, surreal, sad and immoral.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

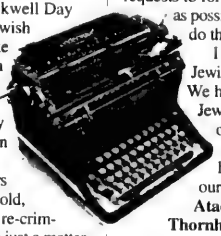
Shivers at Darwinian approach



Every new announcement from Stockwell Day should send shivers down the spine of Jewish Canadians. His views of the country make Ontario Premier Mike Harris and Alberta Premier Ralph Klein look like socialists. His Darwinian approach to society clearly favours the strong, successful and wealthy – those who can afford to Jet Ski around in wet suits.

The flat tax that overwhelmingly favours the well-off has been put on temporary hold, and a referendum that would promote the re-criminalization of abortion will take place, it is just a matter of time.

Whether Day openly admits to it or not, increased privatization of health care is strongly promoted by the Alliance party. Now, he will have everyone who is arrested of an indictable crime required to provide a sample for DNA for testing.

We are getting very close to a police state mentality, which Day and his followers seem to promote. It is a frightening prospect.

Jewish values liberal?

I usually enjoy reading Bruce Elman's column for his incisive observations on the struggle for Jewish survival in communities outside the great metropolitan areas. I am baffled, however, by his last column (CJN, Nov. 23*)*, in which he exhorts Jewish voters not to "stray into error" by supporting the challengers to the Liberals' continuous rule.

In his epistle, he invokes the usual political propaganda in order to inoculate those contemplating such "heresy." The "un-Canadian" values that the opponents of the Liberals represent, according to Elman, also threaten us as Jews, and therefore, vigilance of the highest order is called for.

"Canadian values" (read liberal values) to my understanding are not necessarily Jewish values, and the two can only be fused at our peril. Instead of spouting the partisan election rhetoric, let us be serious about this.

What Jewish values, does Elman think, are contravened, precisely, by opposition to same-sex marriages and abortion on demand?

We have to tell the world

Thanks to Don Carr for the excellent article "The Plain Truth" (CJN, Nov. 16*)*. It shows the essence of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as well as the realistic expectations for its resolution. I receive mountains of e-mail from my Jewish friends about the conflict with requests to forward the information to as many people as possible. But it seems to me that we are trying do the right thing the wrong way.

I believe there is no need to convince most Jewish people of the rightness of Israel's cause. We have to get this information to the non-Jewish world, especially considering the bias of the media in favour of the Palestinians. I think this should be our priority… We have to talk to the world – not just among ourselves.

What goes around comes around

In Judaism, we believe God punishes us midah k'neged midah, in other words, what goes around comes around.

The outrage, pain and helplessness the editor of The CJN feels about the unfair and biased reporting on the Middle East crisis is, in a very real sense, what we as "Ultra" Orthodox Jews have felt about the unfair and biased reporting of The Canadian Jewish News.

Ever since the beginning of the Oslo Peace accord negotiations, Orthodox Jews have been portrayed as extremists, hatemongers and other unfavourable epithets. Though recognizing the necessity and desirability of peace with our Arab neighbours, the rabbis had warned against Yasser Arafat as a suitable peace partner for very obvious reasons.

Those who wield the power of the pen contrive to push for concessions and blind themselves wilfully to the realities of the Middle East, their anti-Semitism cloaked in the so-called desire for peace. The rabbis' foresight, and their logical and realistic approach have unfortunately been proven right.

But there is no outrage for our pain in not seeing that peace in the near future is shared by all. And we, Orthodox and not, are in this together. Rocks, guns and suicide bombers do not differentiate between us.

Share the land?

Regarding the letter to the editor by David Marx in The CJN (Nov. 16), if he takes another look at the Torah, he will see that the Land of Israel is promised solely to Yitzhak. (Genesis: 17: 7-8: "An everlasting covenant… I will give you [Avraham] and your children… the Land of Canaan…[Verse 21] and I will establish my covenant with Yitzhak.")

If Avraham reappeared today, he would tell Ishmael to get out of his brother Yitzhak's house.

THE MIDDLE EAST PEACE PROCESS

Jewish 'spirit' demands peace

By BORIS G FREESMAN

"I am for peace; but when I speak, they are for war." [Psalm 120]

Boris G Freesman

The Family of Israel has reached its moment of truth: the peace process is our process, too. What happens henceforth matters to all of us. While Prime Minister Ehud Barak may be politically accountable only to citizens of the State of Israel, Israel is responsible for the vital intellectual, emotional and spiritual interests of all Jews.

I question whether, today, the State of Israel has the capacity to make peace. I do not doubt the willingness, at least intellectually, but the internal polarization and fragmentation – the rift between right and left, secular and religious, hawks and doves – is so intense that I begin to doubt the prospects of the nation coalescing in support of the noble dream required to achieve it.

"Nothing happens unless first a dream." [Carl Sandburg]

One hundred years ago, Henrik Ibsen wrote portentously about our present dilemma: "... On the other hand, take the Jewish people, the aristocracy of the human race – how is it they have preserved their unique identity, their poetical spirit amid surroundings of coarse cruelty? By having no state to burden them. Had they remained in Palestine, they would long ago have lost their individuality in the process of building their nation – like all other nations."

As I see it, this "unique identity" and "poetical spirit" are the distinctive values, priorities and ethics that Arie Lova Eliav identifies as "biblical humanism." This is the essence of Judaism. Without it, the Zionist dream would never have become a fact. Have we lost this unique spirit? If so, is there hope for peace? And without peace, can either the Family or the State of Israel survive? Must peace with Palestinians mean war within, and peace within, war with Palestinians?

There are still many fundamental issues that have not yet been thoroughly considered:

• Jerusalem – the Old City – touches, deeply, the psyche and soul of Christians, Muslims and Jews, and since Jerusalem is not so much a geopolitical issue between the State of Israel and the Palestinian Authority as it is a symbolic and emotional conflict between Jews and Muslims, neither Barak nor Yasser Arafat, by himself, can resolve it.

• The logic of the Palestinian position on Right of Return and Jerusalem is as valid as the logic of the Israeli position on Right of Return and Jerusalem, and vice versa, but so long as either side persists upon this logic, the conflict is intractable.

• The mutually inflammatory exchanges of rhetoric and the serial escalation of violent responses could not but result in the tragic and deplorable events and deaths that we have witnessed over the past two months: these are clear examples of the tenacious pursuit of this logic and how we would be much better served pursuing a different logic.

• While everyone seeks "win/win" solutions, the requisite understanding has been missing: Barak must make Arafat a winner and Arafat must make Barak a winner.

• The failure, since Oslo, to build bridges of mutual trust plays directly into the hands of extremists and saboteurs on both sides.

• We need solutions that allow not only for justice to prevail, but also for equity, mutual compassion and charity so that a symbolic and emotional catharsis can take place.

Until 1948, we sought a solution to our own Zionist aspirations – no one offered us one, and we were not in a position to offer anything to anyone. We could barely ask. Now that we are in a position to make an offer on Jerusalem while the Palestinians can only ask, can we be true to ourselves – to our defining "poetical spirit"? Dare we practise what we preach?

"That which is hateful unto you, do not unto others." [Hillel]

Jerusalem, the ancient, walled city, should be shared by Israelis and Palestinians in what, in Common Law, is known as "joint tenancy" – that is, each group should have the identical and equal rights of ownership, namely, an undivided interest in the whole of the city.

Jerusalem should not only be governed jointly, but it should also become an innovative, binational, open city. Everyone should have rights of access, but departure should be controlled by the nation into which departure is made.

At this moment in our history, the responsibility for rekindling the light of hope for peace lies with the Family of Israel.

Israel must resist pressure

By THOMAS O. HECHT

Thomas O. Hecht

A half-century after its decolonization, the Middle East continues to be an area of instability, often highlighted by the conspiracy of one country's ruler against his brotherly Arab neighbour. The eight-year Iran/Iraq war caused one million casualties. Kuwait was invaded, occupied and plundered by its northern neighbour Iraq. Lebanon was torn apart by a 15-year civil war. The Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan killed more Palestinians during Black September in 1970 than all the Palestinians who have been killed in all their confrontations with Israel. The Taliban in Afghanistan structured a society that is the brutal antithesis to human advancement. The Sudan has been at war with its Christian south for many years, causing hundreds of thousands of victims.

All the while, the process towards democracy has not entered the political agenda of the Middle East. Authoritarian strong men – proprietors of the means of violence in their societies or absolutist dynastic monarchies – control the levers of power. There is not one Muslim country that is not ready to make war on its Muslim neighbour. The use of poison gas against Muslim civilian populations was an acceptable tactic to both Egypt's Gamal Abdel Nasser and Iraq's Saddam Hussein. Terrorist acts are the pock-marks of history in the Middle East, be they the killing of 20,000 Syrians in the city of Hama by government forces, the hijacking of planes, buses or cruise ships by the PLO, or the innumerable acts of violence perpetrated by Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad.

This is the volatile background of the Israel-Arab dialogue. It is concomitant with a frigid peace with Egypt and a pragmatic and mutually beneficial treaty with the Hashemite dynasty in Jordan, a treaty which is actively objected to by a majority of Jordanians. The Palestinian track is characterized by violent confrontations as an extension of the negotiating process. Incitement to hatred and the denigration of Jews and Israelis by Palestinian officials and the Palestinian media and school textbooks are part of the daily diet. Yasser Arafat regularly calls for a jihad, notwithstanding the various Oslo, Cairo, Wye and Sharm el-Sheikh agreements.

Let us address some of the key issues related to the Palestinian-Israeli agenda.

Land for peace: Never has a nation returned lands to those who have consistently attacked it, seeking its total annihilation as a state and the ethnic cleansing of its non-native born population. So why should Israel alone give up land for peace? Israeli territory represents only one percent of the lands inhabited by Arabs, who invoke unity and pan-Arabism and who are all culturally akin to each other.

A Palestinian state: Israeli military experts and diplomats agree that Israel could not survive if the West Bank mountain ridges that dominate the narrow waistband of Israel were in hostile hands. Seventy percent of the Jewish population and 80 percent of its industrial infrastructure would be made vulnerable even without the existence of a regular Palestinian army.

Palestinian refugee problem: Population transfers have occurred throughout history. After their wars, India and Pakistan exchanged 12 million people. Israel absorbed 800,000 Jews from the Muslim world who had been deprived of their belongings and expelled from Arab lands. Only the Arab world has stubbornly refused to integrate its brothers and their descendants into its society. Arab states have kept their war-displaced fellow Arabs in miserable refugee camps, encouraging them to plot vengeance and terrorism.

Jerusalem: Before the end of the Six Day War, no claim was ever made that Jerusalem was a Muslim holy city or the capital of any Arab country. For over 2,000 years there has been a permanent Jewish presence in Jerusalem and Jews have been the city's majority since the 19th century. Why should Jews give up their right to celestial and terrestrial Jerusalem?

Israel's people and government must stand firm and resolute, thus preventing the concerted pressure of the Arab world to ultimately liquidate the "Zionist entity" from "Arab lands." The Arab world, through its government-controlled media and publications, has replaced Europe of the late 1930s and early '40s as the protagonist attempting to demonize and delegitimize the Jewish people and to deny their rightful place in the family of nations. The only "guarantees" Israel has for security and peace are manifested in its strength, self-reliance and dedicated belief in its entitlement as a sovereign people and as a nation state. These qualities will elicit respect from Israel's genuine and true friends.

The Russians again

The history of the Jews in Russia over the last 150 years could be described in mostly negative terms. Restrictions, disabilities and pogroms marked this period in the earlier years, and heightened waves of anti-Semitism in the later ones.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

After the fall of the Soviet empire, one might have hoped that perhaps some positive changes would take place, but on the contrary, the instability of the new Russia opened the floodgates of Jew hatred once again. We in Canada were amongst the recipient nations of a renewed Jewish emigration from the country, as were Israel and the United States, and Germany more than doubled its Jewish population because of it.

Of late, so it seems, the unease of the remaining Russian Jews has diminished to some extent. New synagogues have been founded; interest in Jewish education – from Reform to Orthodox – has shown a marked increase. The government has been co-operative and has clearly desired to write a new chapter in Russian/Jewish history.

But now comes the Russian Orthodox Church and upsets the apple cart. The Church has recently canonized a very dubious figure. It has moved to acknowledge as a saint none other than Czar Nicholas II, who was executed during the Bolshevik revolution of 1917.

It was under this "saintly" emperor's regime that vicious anti-Jewish pogroms were carried out with regularity, for the czar devoutly believed that the infamous Protocols of the Elders of Zion were actuality rather than forgery. During his regime, Jews left the Russian Empire by the millions, and for good reason.

The latest twist in this unhappy affair is the accusation by the church that it was the Jews who executed the late czar and his family in a "ritual manner." According to Alexander Verhovsky, a scholar of Russian nationalism, the canonization of Czar Nicholas is, to a significant degree, based on anti-Jewish prejudice. The czar is to be elevated to sainthood because, in this view, he was martyred by Jews, even though in fact there was only one Jew present at the execution (all the rest were ethnic Russians). But facts have never bothered those who see a Jewish conspiracy behind everything they do not like.

A saint, by definition, lives an essentially blameless life. The persecution of Jews encouraged by the Czar must therefore, in the Church's perception, have been a justified policy.

Unfortunately, an otherwise progressive Vatican has also embarked on a similar path when it recently advanced the beatification of Pius XII, the only outright anti-Semitic pope in many years. He spoke of our people as dogs, and insisted on confining them to a ghetto.

I am sure I am not alone in my puzzlement.

Where is Winnipeg's youth?

Winnipeg's Jewish community is a very interesting one to be a part of.

As I've mentioned earlier, many people in Winnipeg take a lot of pride in being Jewish and attending Jewish related functions. Two recent events that drew large groups were Israeli MK Moshe Arens' speech at the JCC and the Israeli solidarity rally a few weeks ago at the Shaarey Zedek synagogue. Yet if you were to survey the crowd attending those functions, you would notice a lot of older faces and a significant absence of Winnipeg's Jewish youth.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

Where are the Jewish teens and young adults? A core group, whom everyone seems to know and who are on the boards of the Jewish Student Association (JSA) or such programs as the March of the Living, always get called on to undertake a community project or program. But what about the people who know they are Jewish but never come to a JSA program or attend a Jewish function? There are many more of the latter than the former, and being JSA president, I often wonder why these people don't attend our programs and what can we do to encourage their involvement.

The Winnipeg Jewish Federation is asking the same question. The federation has taken on a new initiative called Federation Next, which is meant to target Jewish youth between the ages of 18 and 24. This age group contains the leaders of tomorrow, and without their involvement in the Jewish community, there will be no foundation for the future. Federation members also want these 18- to 24-year-olds to experience life with other Jews their age, which will hopefully make them more aware and accepting of their background.

Since this project has just taken flight, it is difficult to determine what kind of impact it will have in Winnipeg, but the vision behind it has a lot of merit and, if implemented properly, could increase the participation of Jewish youth in Winnipeg's Jewish community.

I attended a Federation Next meeting recently, where we discussed some of the following issues.

The main question we asked ourselves was why 18- to 24-year-olds are not active in our community. People often say that JSA needs better programs, but I don't think this is necessarily true. For example, JSA had a social recently at a popular bar with a very popular band providing entertainment, but the turnout was still disappointing. On another night, however, with the same band playing at the same bar, but without the JSA title, you would have seen half the Jewish youth in Winnipeg there.

So what is it? It's very hard to pinpoint the problem because there are so many different factors contributing to the lack of community interest in these young adults.

Another issue we discussed was how many Jews think that "Jewish" is a negative word. How do we go about changing that opinion in people? Again, there is no easy answer. I think that inactive Jews don't know what the benefits of being Jewish are and if they did, perhaps their perceptions would change.

As a way to address that issue, Federation Next is developing a newspaper for its target audience, which will not only let 18- to 24-year-olds have a voice, but will also let other people their age see what is happening in the Jewish community. The federation hopes that once they read about being Jewish and what the Jewish community has to offer, these inactive people will begin to see what they are missing.

In the end, it's apparent that there are many factors that contribute to Jewish young people's apathy. Getting 18- to 24- year-olds involved in the community will be a long process, but I think that it is an important one. And the benefits – from making friends, to having knowledge of history and culture, to gaining useful life skills – are endless, even for those who only become minimally involved.

I would be happy to receive comments and ideas on how we can get more youth involved in the Jewish community (or on any other articles I have written).

Ruach is about people, not food

I ate some great blintzes last week. While visiting my sister, who lives in New York City, I indulged myself in every Jewish culinary delicacy that I came into contact with, and even some that I actively sought out.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

Between the delis and the hotdog stands that sold knishes on every corner, I put on 10 pounds, raised my cholesterol level and had a scrumptious time.

You must understand that living in a city like Halifax, it can be a little more difficult to find some of these things than it would be in a place like New York. I presume that because I was born and raised in Toronto, I always took for granted having "Jewish food" at my disposal.

When I decided to go to Dalhousie University for school, I simply overlooked the fact that I might not be able to find knishes, blintzes and challah as easily as I would in Toronto.

What amazed me about New York was how Jewish the city itself really is. I was once told that even if you are not Jewish and you live in New York, you end up being a "Jew by osmosis." This was reinforced to me throughout the entire trip when I was constantly hearing Yiddish terminology such as oy vey and shtick and seeing words like kosher and pareve everywhere that I turned.

Although New York is a cornucopia of religion and culture, the Jewish aspect of it really stood out to me and at first made me envious of my sister who is surrounded by it all the time.

On every occasion when I would meet another Jewish person in New York, I reacted in the way that I would in Halifax. I got excited.

In Halifax, most of us connect almost instantaneously, and I found myself expecting that it would be the same in New York.

In Halifax, the Jewish community moves to a different beat than it does in New York. Haligonians carry a larger responsibility than New Yorkers to keep their Jewish community thriving. To New Yorkers, they are around it all the time; they are conscious of their Jewish self because there is so much Jewish content surrounding them. Notwithstanding that, New York is also home to the largest number of unaffiliated Jews.

There was a Jewish student in Halifax who said that she would only live in a city that has many synagogues and a place where decent bagels and blintzes can be found easily. I must say that this sort of criteria is somewhat the antithesis of what I will look for when I eventually "settle down" here or any other place.

To me, Jewish communities are not made up of cities where you lose count of how many synagogues exist within them, nor are they places where you have a different kosher deli/bakery on every corner.

Jewish communities are about the people, no matter how many or how few, and I cannot make it any more simplistic than that. Finding Jewish cuisine in restaurants and stores in Halifax is not impossible. Maybe because it takes a little more of an effort to find it, one appreciates it more.

While I miss not being able to automatically order blintzes in a restaurant (or even matzah ball soup), I also kvell each time that I make them myself or go to someone's house who serves them for dinner.

While my mouth will continue to water every time my sister tells me about the delicious pastrami sandwich she ate, I will remember that there is so much more that makes up a community.

Even though the entire Atlantic Jewish community cannot compete with New York's numbers, many of them make up for it with their ruach, and large hearts.

By the way, the best blintzes that I have ever had anywhere, including in New York, were of the homemade variety last year at Myrna Yazer's Chanukah party in Halifax.

CORRECTION

In "Jews and the environment" by Jean Gerber (CJN, Nov. 23), Avi Dolgin was incorrectly named as one of the founders of Adam va-Adamah. It is, in fact, Noam Dolgin, environmentalist and educator, who has been active in Adam va-Adamah from the beginning. In addition, the name of the organization was incorrectly spelled. The CJN regrets the errors.

Gitai makes first Israeli film about '73 war

That moment is burned into his consciousness.

On Oct. 11, 1973, the fifth day of the Yom Kippur War and Amos Gitai's 23rd birthday, a Syrian missile smashed through the front window of the military helicopter he was crouched in. The shrapnel killed the co-pilot and bloodied Gitai's back, missing his spine by inches.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Although the aircraft was trembling, the badly injured pilot managed to fly it back to Israeli lines, where it crashed. As it landed with a thud, the engineer was violently thrown from his seat and mortally wounded. And then, save for birdsong, there was a deafening silence before the survivors were rescued.

Gitai, a member of an Israeli air force rescue team which had been dispatched to Syria to pick up the pilot of a downed Skyhawk jet, spent the balance of the war in a convalescent home recuperating from his wounds.

"The Yom Kippur War shook our universe," said Gitai, recalling the incident during which he almost lost his life.

Nearly three decades on, Gitai – one of Israel's finest directors – was in Canada to discuss his newest movie, Kippur, which had its world premiere at the 25th Toronto International Film Festival in September.

Kippur, the first feature-length Israeli picture about the Yom Kippur War, opened in Israel on Oct. 6, exactly 27 years to the day that it erupted furiously along the length of the Golan Heights and the Sinai Peninsula with attacks by Syria and Egypt against lightly-defended Israeli positions.

Largely autobiographical, Kippur turns on two Israeli soldiers, Weinraub (Gitai, in reality) and Ruso, who drive to the Golan front in a white Fiat, and, unable to find their army unit, join a helicopter rescue team whose task is to pluck seriously wounded soldiers from the battlefield and aviators whose planes have been shot down.

As seen mainly through the eyes of Weinraub, the war is a watershed in Israeli history. It was a chaotic conflict which belied the misplaced confidence of Israeli generals in their ability to rout any Arab foe effortlessly and it shattered, once and for all, the myth of Israel's invincibility.

"The war," said Gitai in an interview, "broke Israel's self-assurance."

Gitai, then a student of architecture at the Technion, said he never really considered making a movie about the war after launching his career as a filmmaker in the late 1970s. "Israeli society was in a militaristic mood and Israel didn't need another war film," he explained.

But with the success of Kadosh, his previous film, a graphic and not altogether sympathetic portrayal of haredim in Jerusalem, he was finally able to raise funds for Kippur, which had been long germinating in his mind.

Kippur, an Israeli-French-Italian co-production which cost roughly $5 million (U.S.), a piddling sum by Hollywood standards, could not have been made without the co-operation of the Israel Defence Force. "The IDF was extremely helpful and friendly and understood the importance of making a full-fledged film about the Yom Kippur War."

And the fact that Gitai came close to being killed in that war legitimized his request for assistance, he believes.

"Young officers, in particular, understood the magnitude of the project," said Gitai, who submitted a script to the IDF for approval and who paid for its various services.

Filming began on an auspicious occasion, just as Israel and Syria entered into American-brokered peace negotiations in Maryland in December 1999.

In an effort to produce a character-driven film, Gitai, now 50, persuaded the survivors of his old unit to "adopt" the actors. "I wanted to stay very close to the characters," he said.

Since his overall objective was to convey the improvisational nature of that war, he most definitely had no interest in producing an over-simplified Hollywood-type film which glorified the clash of arms. In essence, he set out to impart the sense that fatigue was the hidden enemy of every last soldier. And he deliberately made the Syrians faceless so as to heighten the ambience of dread.

Insofar as technical details were concerned, Gitai was exceedingly methodical. He sought an appropriate musical score. "I didn't want kitschy music, but rather music which blended in with the mud and the noise." And finally, he would not settle for anything less than sophisticated cinematography.

Kippur took six-and-a-half weeks to complete, often in rainy conditions. "Physically, it was not an easy film to shoot," said Gitai, who is nothing if not prolific.

Gitai's 29th film in 20 years, Kippur is not his first on the Arab-Israeli conflict. In 1980, he completed The House, a documentary about a residential building in Jerusalem that had been owned by a Palestinian Arab but that was now being renovated by a wealthy Israeli Jew. "This house became a kind of metaphor for the Arab-Israeli dispute," he said.

Israeli helicopters during Yom Kippur War.

The House, his inaugural film, was to have been broadcast by Israeli television. But when its director general, Tommy Lapid, demanded drastic cuts, Gitai balked, interpreting Lapid's directive as crass political censorship. "This was very disturbing to me. Israel should be open and democratic."

Two years later, on the eve of Israel's invasion of Lebanon, Gitai started filming Field Diary. A critical examination of Israel's occupation of the West Bank, Field Diary was also rejected by Lapid, the current leader of Israel's anti-clerical Shinui party. "There was no outlet for it in Israel," said Gitai.

Bitterly disappointed by the turn of events, Gitai and his wife, Rifka, an academic, accepted an offer of work in Paris. "We packed our suitcases and left Israel. The visit lasted eight years."

Despite Lapid's antipathy, Field Diary was eventually screened at a number of film festivals in Europe and Asia and at the Tel Aviv Cinematheque and broadcast on television in Sweden, Holland, France, Finland, Austria, Greece, Switzerland, Italy and Britain.

During his exile in France, Gitai was busy, churning out an array of eclectic documentaries on topics ranging from the exploitation of workers in Thailand to the Eurythmics' tour of Japan.

During this period, he made several films revolving around Jewish themes. Esther, a 1985 feature, was about the Jewish wife of the king of Persia who saved her people from annihilation. In 1988, he released Berlin Jerusalem, which dealt with the lives of two Jewish women in Palestine. Wadi, in 1991, turned on the relationship between Jews and Arabs in a hard-scrabble Israeli neighborhood.

Gitai and his family – he and Rifka have two teenage children – returned to Israel in 1993 upon the urging of Shulamit Aloni, the minister of education and culture in Yitzhak Rabin's government. "She came to Paris and we had a meal together. She told me it was time to come home."

And so they went back to Haifa, where Gitai was born, the son of Munio Weinraub, a Bauhaus architect originally from Berlin, and Efradia, a teacher born in pre-state Israel.

Gitai still has fond memories of France. "The French," he said in an implicit rebuke to Israel, "treated us in a civilized manner and it was refreshing."

Before returning to Haifa, Gitai finished The Wupper Valley, a documentary examining the neo-Nazi fringe in Germany. Since then, virtually all his films, from The Arena of Murder to Zion:Auto-Emancipation, have taken place in Israel and have touched on Israeli history. The Arena of Murder was an examination of Israel after Rabin's assassination, while Zion: Auto-Emancipation weaved his parents' stories with that of the proceedings of the first Zionist congress in Basel, Switzerland.

Kadosh, an official selection at the 1999 Cannes Film Festival, is perhaps Gitai's most controversial film to date. Detractors claimed that he cast haredim in a negative light, but Gitai begs to differ.

"Jewish tradition is a great critical tradition, and Kadosh was made in this spirit. I showed the fervour and beliefs of the haredim," he said. "I'm not a religious Israeli, but the datim have a right to their views, as long as they don't try to establish a theocracy in Israel. Some haredim want to portray secular Israelis as empty vessels, but that's wrong."

Currently, Gitai is working on a film, based on an Arthur Miller short story, about a community of intellectuals in New York City in the 1930s. In the near future, he hopes to make a film about Israel's pivotal 1948 War of Independence.

In his view, Israel and the Palestinians have reached "a moment of truth" in their protracted efforts to reach a lasting peace agreement. "Peace with the Palestinians is worth a lot of concessions by Israel," he said. "Israel's relations with the Palestinians are central. We live on the same piece of land."

Asked whether Israel should relinquish the Golan Heights in exchange for peace with Syria, he smiled. "Let the politicians decide. I don't want to leave them unemployed."

Death has no borders

By RABBI YECHIEL BEN AYON

For some, death is a part of everyday life. Doctors, nurses, ambulance workers and police see it as part of their working day. As director of a funeral home, for me, it is clearly inescapable.

One can never let the passing of a person become routine. No matter how long one has been in this service, each situation is unique. No two deaths are alike.

On a recent Friday morning, I entered the office and greeted the secretaries as usual. From their grim response, I surmised that something was indeed unusual. Not minutes before, a call had come in from the Hospital for Sick Children, or "Sick Kids," as we simply say in Toronto.

A child has died, before her second birthday. Could we help?

Certainly, I said. May I speak to the parents?

The voice on the phone said not now, the parents were too devastated.The child was a foreign patient. In fact, she, mother and father had just arrived the previous night. They had come full of hope and anticipation. Suddenly, all had gone wrong in the worst imaginable way.

Could we help, asked the hushed voice, to send the child immediately back to Israel for burial.

A flurry of activity was immediately set into motion. To be buried in Israel, one has first to collect a small mountain of red tape – documents from several levels of government, municipal as well as provincial, authorization from the State of Israel and its department of health, air cargo, even security clearance and more.

In the meantime, the volunteers from bikur cholim were dispatched to sit with the inconsolable parents. A call went out to the Israeli Consulate. This needed to be processed fast with Shabbat coming.

I told them this child is going to a certain city in the Negev.

That town, the voice exclaimed, is an Arab town, this child is not Jewish.

This child is a citizen of the State of Israel, I rejoined after first recuperating from this last insight.

Accustomed to dealing with many chevrah kadishah burial societies throughout Israel, I confess I have no knowledge of or contact with Muslim cemeteries. I was put in touch with the mayor of the town. I explained to him what documents I needed to proceed. He asked for half an hour.

Precisely 30 minutes later, he was on the line again. With him in his home, he said, was the entire Wakf, the regional Muslim religious council. Outside, filling the darkening streets stood family and friends along with half the town, all wailing at the news.

They knew the family, they had raised money for the child for her trip and medical expenses. Through the interpretation of the mayor, I conveyed to the clerics the papers I needed faxed from them. They, in return, heaped their blessing on me, "the son of Abraham," for helping to return the child for burial within the prescribed 24 hours of Muslim law.

Thank you, I said.

Parents and child were, sadly, placed on the plane. Later that evening, as I walked home from the Shabbat service, I could not help but think of the day's events. There are many more Muslims than Jews living in the GTA. Certainly they have their own facilities, and yet it was to the Jewish funeral home that they turned. It was the bikur cholim, an Orthodox volunteer organization, that calmed them and cared for them and drove them to Pearson International Airport.

How sad I thought, that it takes a child's death to remind us, Jew and Arab, of the common humanity to which we both belong.

Bret Harte's Jewish roots

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

The American writer Bret Harte (1836-1902) is best known for his stories about pioneer life in California. Published in 1869, The Luck of Roaring Camp brought the Albany-born adventurer his first fame, heightened the following year by his poem, The Heathen Chinee.

Harte "was no western he-man," according to literary critic Marcus Cunliffe.

"Brought up in Brooklyn and New York City, precociously talented and bookish… he was an esthete who had gained little firsthand experience of the mining camps about which he wrote."

A friend of Mark Twain, Harte was considered in the front ranks of American authors. It is not well known that he was closely related to one of Canada's most famous Jewish families, the Harts of Trois-Rivières and Montreal, whose patriarch was Aaron Hart, the first Jew to settle in Canada.

The fascinating and peculiar story of Harte's Canadian-Jewish links is detailed in H.C. Merwin's fine 1912 biography, The Life of Bret Harte. Merwin relates that Harte's grandfather, Bernard Hart, was born in London about 1763, and came as a boy of 13 "to Canada, where his relatives were numerous."

Three years later, Bernard surfaced in New York, and apparently lived intermittently in both places until about 1800. Although Bernard, a devout Jew, was deeply involved with New York's first synagogue, Shearith Israel, he married Catharine Brett, a gentile, in 1799; their brief marriage produced a son, Henry.

Bernard's second marriage, to Zipporah Seixas in 1806, produced about a dozen children.

Bernard became a highly successful merchant, militiaman and secretary of the New York Stock Exchange. Of his children, several became distinguished merchants; Emanuel became a congressman. There was another Henry, who died of consumption. The family merits several entries in the Encyclopedia Judaica.

The writer, born as Francis Brett Harte, was descended from Bernard's first marriage. Bernard supported his ex-wife and son, even occasionally visited them, but apparently kept them hidden away.

"None of his [Bernard's] descendants on the Hebrew side knew of his marriage to Catharine Brett or of the existence of his son, the first Henry Hart, until some years after Bret Harte's death," Merwin writes.

"It seems almost incredible that this Hebrew merchant, prominent as he was in business and social life, in clubs and societies, in the militia and the synagogue, should have been able to keep the fact of his first marriage so secret that it remained a secret for a hundred years; it seems very unlikely that a woman of good English birth and family should in that era have married a Jew; it is highly improbable that a father should give to a son by a second marriage the same name already given to his son by a former marriage. And yet all these things are indisputable facts."

Merwin raises another delicious irony: "How far was the venerable Jew from suspecting that the one fact in his life which he was so anxious to conceal was the very fact which would rescue his name from oblivion, and preserve it so long as English literature shall exist!"

The precise genealogical connection between Bernard and Aaron Hart is apparently still undocumented. But Malcolm Stern, in his masterpiece First American Jewish Families: 600 Genealogies, 1654-1988, brings us one step closer by revealing that Bernard's father was named Menachem.

Bret Harte spent his last years in London. In Who Lies Where: A Guide to Famous Graves, Michael Kerrigan relates that Harte was buried in a churchyard in Frimley, Surrey, that "seems a world away from the rowdy western boomtowns he liked to describe in his stories."

Jewish Life

The half-Jewish experience

The Half Jewish Book, A Celebration
by: Daniel Klein and Freke Vuijst, Random House, $32.95

Books
Bernard Baskin

It's happening fast and not enough attention is being paid. As almost a majority of American Jews marry non-Jews, the number of American half-Jews under the age of 11 now exceeds the number of American full Jews under that age. And this half-Jewish population will only grow even larger as the percentage of intermarriages increases.

The authors of this non-scholarly, light-hearted book maintain that being half-Jewish is a quality unto itself – a cultural, intellectual and esthetic mix that is, in a variety of ways, greater than the sum of its parts.

To those who protest that you are either Jewish or not and there is nothing in between, the authors respond that half-Jews synthesize their cultural halves into positive and rewarding new identities.

In many cases, this book asserts, half-Jewish children are receiving more Jewish education then their full-Jewish friends and neighbours.

"This raises the mind-boggling possibility that despite the frequently heard admonitions against intermarriage (and the implicit argument that half-Jewish children mark the beginning of the end for Judaism), half-Jews may be in the vanguard of carrying Jewish traditions into the future".

This runs counter to most findings and seems hardly likely when the reader learns that both religious traditions – Christian and Jewish – are usually observed in the home. A number of half-Jewish families light yahrzeit candles for their deceased Jewish relatives and memorial candles in a church. A majority of these households celebrate both Chanukah and Christmas. Many have a Passover seder and enjoy an Easter dinner.

The authors ask, "Are half-Jews conflicted and confused about this double set of holidays? On the contrary, from what they tell us, most feel doubly blessed."

They add, however, that the feelings of grandparents are another story. One must wonder about the religious and cultural identity and confusion that results from "being able to dance at all weddings."

This book brings many half-Jews to our attention. These include the actress Gwyneth Paltro, who on her father's side is descended from a dynasty of Russian rabbis; the actresses Dyan Cannon and Goldie Hawn who have Jewish mothers and identify themselves as Jews, and General Westley Clark, commander of NATO forces in Yugoslavia, who discovered his half-Jewish status late in life and warmly embraced it.

This wide-ranging book provides information on many other eminent politicians, writers, athletes, musicians, etc., who are half-Jewish. Also discussed is how half-Jews have been portrayed in films, on television and in literature.

A brief chapter depicts the unhappy status of half-Jews in Nazi Germany. Many of them who survived the war vividly remember a chilling image that the newspaper Der Sturmer used to illustrate their status as Mischlinge: A Jew sat on a yellow chair, a German sat on a green chair, and in between, without a chair at all, squatted a Mischling.

The authors come down solidly and enthusiastically on the side of celebration. The Jewish future however, of half-Jews and their offspring is clouded and uncertain. There is little reason for optimism.

Sites for Jewish deaf – Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Internet excels in its ability to allow people with relatively specialized needs to exchange information and even forge virtual communities around the world.

This is particularly true for people who are Jewish and deaf who may feel excluded or even alienated from the larger Jewish community. The Internet has some excellent resources for Jewish people who are deaf, their families and for the community-at-large that wants to build bridges and understanding.

The Mutual Assistance for the Deaf and Hard of Hearing is an Israel-based site which offers a wealth of information in both Hebrew and English [http://www.boker.org.il/deaf/eng/]. There are links to resources for the Jewish community and general articles on topics like the debate over cochlear implants. There's even a diagram for you if you want to try your hand at Hebrew Fingerspelling [http://www.boker.org.il/deaf/israel/esign.htm].

Another excellent place to find resources for Jewish deaf people is at the Jewish Deaf Community Center [http://www.jdcc.org/]. The JDCC was established in 1992 in Southern California to empower deaf and hard of hearing persons to be full participants in the Jewish community. You can read both the latest newsletter and back issues of the JDCC News which focus on topics of interest to the Jewish deaf community. The site has a community e-mail meeting place and a very good set of links to related Web sites.

An excellent way for someone trying to learn more about the resources available to Jewish deaf people is by meeting others who are facing similar challenges. You can join that worldwide community through e-mail lists such as the one established by The Wolk Center for the Jewish Deaf in Rochester, N.Y. [http://www.infoshop.com/wolkcenter/djlist.html].

For personal insight into some of the challenges facing people who are Jewish and deaf, I highly recommend the writings of Jon Kalish, a hearing reporter who has reported extensively about issues concerning the Jewish deaf [http://www.advancedoncology.org/kalish/deaf.htm]. Kalish writes about efforts to counter the work of messianic organizations that target Jewish deaf people; he speaks to the first deaf person enrolled in the Jewish Theological Seminary and he shares his own experiences of being married to a woman who is partially deaf.

What are some of the halachic issues surrounding people who are deaf?

Several years ago, Rabbi Mordechai Shuchatowitz, spiritual leader of Congregation Agudas Israel of Greenspring in Baltimore, wrote a paper called Halacha Concerning the Deaf and Hearing Impaired. I couldn't find the entire article on the Web but it has been summarized in the Jewish Week [http://www.advancedoncology.org/kalish/halacha.htm].

Some excerpts: "Deaf Jews who are unable to say daily prayers, the Shema and blessings before meals with their mouths should think them in their hearts instead."

"The use of hearing aids is permitted on Shabbat even though they are technically considered miniaturized, portable microphones which are usually prohibited on the day of rest. But because hearing aids don't produce sound audible to the public, they're kosher."

"Shuchatowitz declares that the deaf and hearing impaired can be counted on to complete a minyan."

Rabbi Shuchatowitz's four children all have either severe or profound hearing loss.

How do you say mazal tov, bentsh licht or Rosh Hashanah using sign language? David Bar-Tzur has a good idea. Bar-Tzur is Visiting Professor at the National Technical Institute for the Deaf in Rochester, N.Y.

Bar-Tzur is working on creating a glossary of religious terms for ASL (American Sign Language) interpreters. In addition to religious phrases from other faiths, many Jewish words and terms are included in his glossary [http://www.rit.edu/~dabdis/].

Ben-Tzur's translation into sign language notation may look cryptic to most of us. But when these words are animated into sweeping arm movements and gestures, non-hearing Jews can share in the phrases that are so loved by the rest of the community.

Mideast conflict being fought on two battlegrounds, says CIC

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The situation in the Middle East is a global conflict and the battle is being fought on two grounds, says the national director of the Canada Israel Committee.

"Locally it is a military battle, but internationally it is a battle of propaganda. Both battlegrounds have equal meaning and importance, and we have to win on both," said Rob Ritter, at the recent national executive meeting of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO.

At the meeting, Toronto lawyer Donald Carr was honoured for the support and legal advice he has given the organization for the past 30 years. Also speaking was Haim Divon, the Israeli ambassador to Canada.

The Canadian dimension of the battle is about Canadian society and public opinion, he said. "Canada has interests in the Middle East other than Israel. There is a growing number of Arabs in the country and their position in Canadian society is changing. We have to deal with that."

The demonstrations in the Middle East were violent, he said, but the demonstrations in Canada were also serious. "We saw Arab communities calling for the slaughter of Jews, and we saw an Israeli flag being burned. [The conflict] is a global experience, and it is affecting us."

The battle and the battlegrounds differ in dynamics, and the meek are winning the battle of propaganda, he said. "[Yasser] Arafat has created a new weapon – the child martyr. How do you fight the image of a child being killed? We have to make sure the public knows the truth."

Canada should not have supported the UN Security Council motion condemning Israel for the recent violence, he said. "It rewarded Arafat for choosing violence over negotiations, and it emboldened him."

Divon said that Arafat felt isolated in the international arena, and the only way to gain the upper hand was to instigate riots. "He thought that people would sympathize with the underdog – the Palestinians – and in the short run, he was able to achieve that goal."

Without realizing it, said Divon, the international community commended Arafat for leaving the negotiating table.

Things began changing, however, when Arafat "got the message that he cannot twist our arms, and we will not change our position."

The hostilities will not end overnight, he said, "but at least things are changing. Our position is that if we are not shot at, we will not open fire. We will just react – not initiate.

"Israelis are committed to peace, but our message to Arafat is that we know how to protect ourselves, and he is getting that message," said Divon.

When we see the solidarity rallies and see tourists travel to Israel "we realize we are not alone, and that we have the strength to continue," he said.

Ritter said, however, that we should not feel a sense of false security in Israel or in the Diaspora. "Israel had experienced a lull, and there was a complacency and lack of preparedness.

"In the Diaspora, Israel was just not on our radar screen. We have to stay on top of ourselves and of our environment. At the end of the day, we can never rely on others – especially the Palestinians – for our fundamental security," said Ritter.

Celebrating culture and heritage at Baycrest

Throughout the year, residents and patients of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care have the opportunity to observe and acknowledge all Jewish Holidays, and Shabbat, through synagogue services and special programs.

These activities, as well as language-based programs such as Hungarian and Yiddish, contribute to the emotional and spiritual well-being of Baycrest clients and pay tribute to their heritage, culture and faith.

Many of these special programs are supported by the fundraising efforts of The Baycrest Centre Foundation. One example is the annual Art and Soul Auction organized by two of the Foundation's service groups - the Women's Auxiliary and the Leadership Development Group.

Here are a few examples of the special programs delivered by Baycrest's Department of Therapeutic Recreation:

Annie Petroff (right) participates in the L'Chaim program with Baycrest's culture and heritage program coordinator Arlene Sanders (left) and (behind) healthcare aide Sofiya Freeedman.

Sabbath

The Sabbath is observed every week with synagogue services and candle lighting in the dining rooms on each of the floors in the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged (JHA). The Women's Auxiliary supports a Shalom program where school children sing songs for hospital patients. On alternate weeks, a smaller Shabbat program is held on some hospital floors.

Sarah Spiel (left) participates in a cooking group for Rosh Hashanah, assisted by long-time volunteer Sarah Barnartt.

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur

This is a time for Baycrest residents and patients to wish their floor community a happy and healthy new year. The sweet smell of honey and challah is in the air, as well as apples and wine.

Succot

Clients help to decorate the beautiful Women's Auxiliary succah located in the west courtyard of the Apotex Centre. This year's succah was the largest yet for Baycrest! Visits are organized for residents and hospital patients.

Chanukah

Each floor in the JHA and Hospital celebrates Chanukah with a festive party. Lighting of the candles takes place on all units at Baycrest for each of the eight nights. Residents and patients have the opportunity to make traditional potato latkes and call loved ones overseas through the Chanukah phone call program, generously sponsored each year by Wilson Heights Lodge B'Nai Brith.

Purim

Most floors hold Purim parties. Residents and patients can help make Shaloach Manot (Purim baskets) which are distributed throughout the centre. This program is sponsored by the Women's Auxiliary. Megillah is read in synagogue.

Passover

Baycrest provides Sedarim on the home and hospital floors. For Passover in the Apotex Centre, 36 Seder leaders are needed. If you are interested, call Arlene at (416) 785-2500, ext. 2546.

Yom Hashoah

The Yom Hashoah program commemorates the Holocaust with a major assemblage that includes readings, prayers and songs. Since many of Baycrest's clients and staff are Holocaust survivors, this program is especially meaningful for residents, patients and their families.

Jewish military exhibit to be launched at Lipa Green

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish war veterans are steps away from realizing their dream: a permanent, museum-quality exhibit chronicling the heroics of Jews who served their country in all its wars and conflicts.

After five years of planning, "tons" of archives, photographs, memorabilia and artifacts await temporary display in the fourth-floor rotunda of Toronto's Lipa Green Building, says Sol Raibmon, president of the newly-formed Jewish Canadian Military Archives. Inc.

"We're ready to go. We have so much stuff, only 10 percent of it can be displayed," Raibmon told The CJN.

Eventually, Jewish war veterans want a permanent, more spacious display, most likely somewhere in Toronto, perhaps in a separate wing of the Lipa Green Building.

Earlier this month, Jewish Canadian Military Archives Inc. received a federal tax number, meaning it can issue charitable receipts for donations. The group is on a public fundraising drive to raise roughly $1 million needed to complete the project.

Soldiers' role to be highlighted

The organization combines representation from the Jewish War Veterans of Canada and General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion.

The exhibit's intent is two-fold: to dispel the myth that Jews did not serve in armed conflicts, and to get today's Jewish public to take notice.

Jewish war vets, Raibmon laments, are under-appreciated. "After the war, we were the darlings of the community. Now, we're the forgotten Jews. We were the guys who helped stop the Holocaust and liberate the death camps. And no one wants to know from us," said Raibmon, himself a World War II veteran of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

The project will stress that not only did Jews fight, but, at least during World War II, had special reason to do so: to defeat the very evil that was destroying their brethren in Europe.

Proportionally, more Jews fought in World War II than any other group: of a war-time Jewish population of 160,000, fully one-tenth, 16,000, signed up for service, breaking down as follows: army, 10,235; air force, 5,889; navy, 569; and 163 who served in Allied Forces, such as Britain or the United States.

In all, World War II claimed between 422 and 428 Canadian Jewish soldiers dead, missing, and presumed dead. A total of 334 were wounded and 85 were prisoners of war. Nearly 200 were decorated.

The exhibit will chronicle Jewish involvement in all other wars, going back as far as British General James Wolfe, who conquered Quebec in 1759 at the Battle of the Plains of Abraham. Wolfe's aide-de-camp was a Jewish lieutenant-colonel named Schomberg. Members of the Hart family, the first Jews to settle in Canada, had a long and distinguished military history.

As far as Raibmon knows, a Jewish bugler, Joe Morris, was the only Canadian Jewish casualty of the Boer War. The Korean conflict of the early 1950s also claimed a lone Jew, an infantryman from Halifax named Leveson.

World War I saw over 4,000 Jewish servicemen take part, and about 150 killed. The last known Canadian Jewish survivor of the Great War, Sam Kerneman, died recently at age 101.

The display will also recognize the efforts of Canadian Jewish peacekeepers, through to the present day.

Raibmon feels there are as many as 2,500 Canadian-born Jewish war veterans in this country, and he'd like see participation from all of them.

"This will be a great educational tool. It tells people that Jews served, and served with pride."

Raibmon says he's been approached by the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa and by planners of a future Jewish museum in Toronto to house the exhibit. Both offers are being considered. "We want to keep it under a Jewish roof," he says.

While organizers initially want material from Canadian-born veterans, they foresee the day when the exhibit will showcase items from Jewish veterans of foreign armies, especially Poland and the Soviet Union, and from those who served in the Machal – foreign volunteers who fought in Israel's War of Independence.

The exhibit is seeking personal papers, commendations and medals, photographs and all memorabilia. All material is being catalogued and stored by the Ontario Jewish Archives, under director Stephen Speisman.

Patrons of the project include former defense minister Barney Danson, Jack Granatstein, the former director of the Canadian War Museum, and Brig.-Gen. Ed Fitch, the highest-ranking Jewish member of the Canadian Armed Forces today.

For more information, Raibmon may be reached at 905-881-4213.

Canada monitoring Italian war crimes case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is paying close attention to an Italian war crimes proceeding in which a Vancouver resident, Michael Seifert, is being tried in absentia on murder, torture and rape charges.

"We have a member of the office attending the trial in Italy, taking note of the evidence and proceedings," said Max Wolpert, acting deputy director of the Justice Department's war crimes unit. Canadian officials hope to "determine what the evidence is regarding the activities of Mr. Seifert during World War II."

Seifert, 76, is charged in connection with 18 deaths, as well as the rape and torture of prisoners at the Bolzano concentration camp during 1944-45. According to reports from Verona, Italy, evidence has linked Seifert to an SS commando unit.

The Italian government, meanwhile, has reportedly launched an extradition process for Seifert. Canadian authorities had not yet received any requests for extradition, Wolpert said.

"The requesting state would have to make a prima facie case – a level of proof that, if uncontradicted, would make out the offense," he said. Canada could also move to strip Seifert of Canadian citizenship and deport him, he acknowledged.

In that case, "we would independently assess the evidence and would then decide if there are sufficient grounds to do anything under Canadian law," Wolpert said.

Canadian Jewish Congress urged federal authorities to act quickly.

"This is an opportunity for the federal war crimes unit to demonstrate it holds to its statement of zero tolerance for the presence of suspected war criminals in Canada," said Irving Abella, national chair of Congress' war crimes committee.

Evidence at the Italian hearing indicated that Siefert, who entered Canada in 1951,turned down a request that he participate in the proceedings.

(As The CJN was going to press, news arrived that Seifert was found guilty of the charges.)

New joint effort launched

Romberg said the new initiative will also look at the compensation efforts of such countries as Belgium, the Netherlands, Poland and Austria.

"We won't be a direct service provider, but an organizer," Romberg said. "We'll help with application completion, and we'll advocate at the Claims Conference for more funding for Canada."

Specifically, Canada needs money to help compile a data bank of all survivors in this country. The distribution of the Swiss funds for the needy produced one, and the gathering of Holocaust survivors in Ottawa in 1985 produced another, but those need to be merged and updated, explained Rosenberg.

In any event, he said, Canada is home to the third largest survivor population in the world, after Israel and the United States.

As well, survivors would like to see a Canadian telephone line staffed by experts who can answer questions on compensation. (There already is one for unpaid war-era insurance claims, 1-800-496-1974.)

As Rosenberg explains it, survivors often don't know they can take advantage of little-known aspects of compensation.

For example, many recipients of German pensions are unaware they can apply for increases due to rises in inflation and cost of living.

Another little-known perk is the availability of all-expense paid trips to some U.S. spas. According to Rosenberg, some survivors are eligible for two-week stays, every two years, at a spa for reasons of emotional and/or physical well-being.

Meantime, Rosenberg is looking forward to something survivors in Canada have wanted for years: representation by their peers at the Claims Conference, the central body that has negotiated with Germany and other countries since 1952.

Currently, Canada is allotted two seats on the conference's board. Both are occupied by the president and national executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, through CJC's membership in the World Jewish Congress.

Rosenberg said CJC has agreed to relinquish both seats to survivors.

CJC president Moshe Ronen confirmed that executive director Jack Silverstone has resigned his seat at the conference. But Ronen, the son of a survivor, said he knew nothing about giving up his own seat.

"I think there's some merit to having a second-generation person at the table," he said.

'Tainted' works of art held by U.S. museums: scholar

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Upwards of several hundred paintings of questionable provenance are still in the possession of American museums, says a scholar who has studied the issue of Nazi-plundered art in Europe.

Ori Soltes, in a lecture at Holy Blossom Temple, made this startling disclosure on the day the National Gallery in Washington, D.C. announced it would return a 17th-century Flemish painting to its pre-war proprietors, a Jewish family whose art collection was looted by the Nazis.

Soltes, a professor of fine arts and theology at Georgetown University, suggested that public pressure will force museums, in the United States and elsewhere, to come to terms with tainted holdings in their respective collections.

"This is a problem that'll go away if we let it go away," said Soltes, co-founder and chair of the Holocaust Art Restitution Project, which has created a database and published monographs on Nazi-looted art.

"This problem is worthy of our attention," he added. "It's not just a European problem. It requires a historical resolution, and is of emotional import."

Estimating that one-fifth of the world's art moved from one place to another during World War II, Soltes said that literally hundreds of thousands of pieces were stolen by Nazi Germany.

They ranged from paintings and drawings to tapestries and furniture.

In an aside, he accused the Red Army and Allied soldiers of also taking part in the wholesale looting.

Soltes said that the issue of Nazi-plundered art faded away in the early 1950s, only to re-emerge in the 1990s.

Citing reasons for this phenomenon, he listed the opening of government archives in Eastern Europe after the collapse of the Soviet Union, the construction of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, the Swiss banking scandal, and the publication of Hector Feliciano's landmark book, The Lost Museum: The Nazi Conspiracy To Steal the World's Greatest Works of Art.

Since 1997, there have been a number of international conferences on the topic and the American Association of Museum Directors has urged museums to check the origin of their collections.

Soltes said that the Nazis initiated the plunder by forcing Jewish collectors in Germany to sell their works at bargain-basement prices at so-called "Jew auctions."

Once the war began, the Nazi regime accelerated the process by enlisting the help of compliant art dealers and museum directors.

What was not taken by Nazi leaders themselves was channelled to German museums or sold and bartered, Soltes said.

Nazi-looted art subject of video exhibit

TORONTO — The point of departure of Vera Frenkel's video exhibit, Body Missing, now at the Goethe Institut until Dec. 21, is Adolf Hitler's fantasy of building a vast museum of art in his boyhood town of Linz, Austria.

Vera Frenkel

A failed artist who considered himself a connoisseur, Hitler dreamed of stocking this museum, which was never built, with works acquired by theft or forced sales.

With the outbreak of World War II, he and his greedy minions started looting Jewish-owned paintings, prints, drawings and sculptures from Nazi-occupied Europe.

They were carefully stored in the Altausse salt mines near Linz. When Allied forces liberated that region, they discovered that some of these works had disappeared.

Frenkel, a distinguished Canadian artist born in the former Czechoslovakia, uses these events in an unusual exhibit which marries modern technology with the nature of memory, loss and displacement.

Through the medium of a six-channel video installation mounted on two monitors and connected to a Web site (www.yorku.ca/bodymissing), she illustrates the usefulness of electronic art to dwell on these and other themes such as the bureaucratization of everyday life.

The videotapes, each six minutes in length and in effect a conversation with the past, convey dark, eerie images that engender a mood of uncertainty, disquiet and moral bankruptcy.

The camera pans on dimly-lit salt mine corridors filled with wooden crates housing the purloined works in question, some 6,000 in number.

Random dialogues in which their disposition are discussed lend an urgent note to the proceedings.

Although Body Missing focuses on art confiscated from Jewish collectors, it takes note of a lawsuit filed by the German city of Bremen to reclaim works stolen by the Russians in the immediate aftermath of the war.

The Web site reveals the existence of a group of writers and artists who have committed themselves to identifying the art plundered by the Nazis.

Without a doubt, Body Missing takes a fresh, new look at topics still very much under scrutiny.

גידי קורן וחברים

ימים קשים

אוכלוסיית ישראל היא 6,000,000 איש.
מתוכם 2,000,000 בפנסיה,
מה שמשאיר 4,000,000 שיעשו את כל העבודה.

יש 1,500,000 תלמידים בבתי הספר
מה שמשאיר 2,500,000 איש שיעשו את העבודה.

מתוכם 500,000 עובדי מדינה,
מה שמשאיר לנו 2,000,000 שיעשו את העבודה.

צה"ל מעסיק 600,000 איש
ולכן נשארים 1,400,000 איש לעשות את העבודה.

מה עודי יש 600,000 ערבים,
כך שבשעת חירום יש רק 80,000 איש לעשות את העבודה.

לסיום, דו"ח בתי הסוהר מדווח על 79,998 אסירים,
מה שמשאיר רק אותך ואותי!

ותראה מה שאתה עושה-
במקום לעבוד, אתה קורא טור טפשי שכותב רופא תמהוני בעיתון יהודי.
תתבייש לך ולך לעבוד!!! (שי שאר הינינו).

Changing role of shuls explored

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Synagogue in transition" is replacing "Jewish continuity" as the new buzz phrase, says a professor of liturgy at Hebrew Union College in New York.

"The synagogue is on the verge of a golden age; Jews are entering a new era [in synagogue life]," says Rabbi Lawrence Hoffman, an exponent of spiritual renewal for North American Jewry.

Rabbi Hoffman, a native of Kitchener, Ont. was the first speaker in the three-part Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture series, held recently at Holy Blossom Temple.

He is the co-founder of Synagogue 2000, a trans-denominational project aimed at helping synagogues enhance their appeal both for current congregants and non-affiliated Jews.

Over the years, he said, synagogues in North America have gone from being ethnic enclaves for immigrants who wanted to belong in Western culture to places where parents dropped their children off to be educated.

"The '50s and '60s saw synagogues with huge school wings and small sanctuaries because parents dropped their kids off and left. This was the birth of pediatric Judaism.

"Also in the '50s, we began [realizing] that Jews were being persecuted in many places around the world so we started helping them. People belonged to the synagogue but their energy was elsewhere – raising money to save Jewish lives."

Most recently, he said, the synagogue has developed a corporate structure with a board who hires the rabbi and the staff. "The rabbi is the CEO who markets products. You can tell by the market share if it is being marketed well.

"This is the worst way to build spirituality; it is based on adding members, and the members become consumers," he said.

In order to make our children realize that Judaism is something worthwhile and that the synagogue is the centre of Jewish life, said Rabbi Hoffman, we have to get over this corporate culture.

"We need a place where people care for one another and study together – a place where a group of Jews can meet and form a genuinely sacred community. That is the key."

In a sacred community, he said, no one uses anyone else. "It is a place where people have a bond between them, and where they are in touch with the holy…They have gotten rid of the corporate culture and they are thinking of different ways to reach people. If you touch people in a personal way, they will return.

"It is also a place that has moved from the utilitarian to a place where people know they are cared for, and where they know that God is among them.".

That type of community, however, is not easily created, he said. "Members may not recognize that the synagogue is not reaching out beyond the inner core of members. This change can happen over a number of years."

In his work with Synagogue 2000, he discovered that one of the biggest concerns is that not enough people are joining synagogues.

"In the United States, 70 percent of Jews have [at one time] belonged to a synagogue, but at any given time, only 30 percent belong. Canada usually follows those trends.

"A synagogue can be too small because [at that size] there would be too many demands placed on each member, but it can never be too large. A large group can break into smaller, more intimate groups."

A synagogue knows in a number of ways if it has successfully transformed into a spiritual community, he said. "More people would belong, and more people would be engaged in Judaism in one way or another.

"As well, people would be making friends in synagogue, and would feel warmly welcomed when they came. They would be coming to a place where they felt good."

CORRECTION

In the story, "Angry readers, advertisers boycott the Star" (CJN, Nov. 23), David Fuss was incorrectly referred to as John Fuss. We regret the error.

OMISSION

In its round-up of Jewish candidates in Toronto-area municipal elections, The CJN omitted mention of two: Daniel Radin ran against Coun. Mike Feldman in Toronto's Ward 10. He polled 18 percent of the vote. And Mitch Klinger ran for regional councillor in Markham, winning one percent of ballots.

CLARIFICATION

The way the article "Election fever bypasses Calgary's Jewish Community" (CJN, Nov. 16) was written left the position of the Calgary Jewish Community Council open to misinterpretation. Calgary Jewish Community Council, as a non-partisan institution, cannot and does not endorse any political party. The CJN regrets any misunderstanding that may have arisen as a result of this article.

Teen finds success against the odds

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some day, Amanda would like to make a snowman. "It might sound silly," said the vivacious teenager, "but it's going to fulfil me, and make me happy."

Amanda (not her real name) missed out on a normal childhood, having escaped an abusive home several years ago, when she was placed in foster care by Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS).

But a snowman couldn't make the young immigrant much happier than she was on receiving her long-coveted landed immigrant status this summer from Elinor Caplan, Canada's minister of citizenship and immigration, who was at JF&CS' York Region branch for an unrelated meeting.

Even talking about the occasion two months later at the home she shares with her foster parents, brought tears of joy to Amanda's eyes.

"You don't know how much this means to me," she said.

Finally, after the intervention of several lawyers and social workers, Amanda is no longer an "alien" in Canada.

Her new status meant she could obtain a social insurance number and a passport, enabling her to travel out of the country and enrol in a post-secondary institution.

Although Amanda says it wouldn't have been possible without JF&CS, she herself took an active role.

"Meeting with her certainly made the matter more compelling for me," agency executive director Gordon Wolfe told The CJN. "You have to be impressed [with her], when you consider what she went through, and where she's gotten to."

The meeting with Caplan was very moving, Wolfe said. JF&CS staff and Amanda's foster parents were crying. "It's a real success story."

Her parents had separated, and her mother went on to new relationships. Amanda recalls drinking and physical and verbal abuse.

Eventually she sought help. Initially aggressive – "I wasn't taught any other way" – she now exudes warmth and confidence.

"I've really come a long way," she said.

"Living in a different environment changed me altogether. I saw other normal families. I said, 'Is this a dream, or reality?'"

With help from her previous foster mother and encouragement from one teacher in particular, Amanda's grades soared.

"It's such a feeling of satisfaction," the teen said.

She is convinced she wouldn't have finished high school if she had stayed at home, and suspects she might have turned to drugs or prostitution, perhaps even have a child of her own by now. "Wow! I'm not like this at all!"

Amanda is determined not to end up like her parents. "I'm doing everything my mother never had a chance to do. I'm happy with myself."

NCSY concert puts focus on unity

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Achdus, unity, is the theme of the 20th annual concert of NCSY, National Conference of Synagogue Youth.

"We usually bring in people from other places, rather than using Toronto talent," NCSY administrator Roz English told The CJN. "This year we wanted to build Toronto and New York into one community."

The concert, called An Evening of Musical Achdus, will be held at Roy Thomson Hall on Dec. 4 at 7:30 p.m.

Singer Shlomo Simcha will highlight the Toronto performers, along with The Eitz Chaim Boys Choir and Dovi Dovid.

Popular New York performers Shloimie Dachs, Mendy Wald and Yisroel Williger will round out the concert.

The Nafshenu Orchestra will provide musical accompaniment.

Regional director Rabbi Glenn Black said there were three new NCSY inititatives that he is particularly pleased about.

The first is a CD-ROM with information about NCSY, Jewish holidays, and what is going on in Toronto, Montreal and other Jewish communities.

The CD-ROM will be distributed free, beginning at the concert. Rabbi Black said that he hopes it will go to "every bar and bat mitzvah kid, and every graduate from a Canadian Hebrew school."

Another new effort is an organization for NCSY alumni on university and college campuses. Called U-NCSY, it will offer opportunities for learning, multimedia projects and trips.

With 40 hours of volunteer community service now compulsory in many high schools, Rabbi Black is organizing NCSY's third new initiative, called Criss-Cross Canada, which he calls a "mitzvah trip."

For 30 days, students will travel by bus from Toronto to Vancouver and finally Los Angeles, stopping at various places along the way to do "whatever the community needs," from helping out at shuls and giving classes, to visiting the sick or seniors and cleaning cemeteries.

For more information, call Roz English, 905-761-6279, ext. 21, or visit NCSY's Web site at www.ncsy.ca. Tickets for the concert can be purchased there, as well as at the NCSY office until the day of the concert. No tickets will be available at the door.

Canada urged to speak out against international anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada should take a leading role on the international scene to condemn the anti-Semitic attacks that have targeted more than 100 synagogues around the world, said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

The United Nations resolution that condemned Israel for the violence in the region contributed greatly to the worldwide outbreak of anti-Semitism, Rabbi Cooper asserted. Canada supported that resolution and even though Prime Minister Jean Chrétien subsequently expressed regret to Canadian Jews for the distress it caused, "he has not spoken out internationally about hate incidents against Jews.

"We're going to push the United States and Canada to specifically speak out in international forums against these manifestations," he said.

Rabbi Cooper was in Toronto to help launch the centre's CD, Digital Hate 2001. The CD-ROM is an interactive study of more than 2,500 Web sites that promote racism,violence and hate music. As part of the release ceremonies, the centre presented its first-ever Award of Recognition to Ashok Kalle, president of Pathway Communications. Kalle was honoured for ensuring the Internet service provider (ISP) did not host any hate sites – even in the face of threats and harassment.

In remarks delivered at the Windsor Arms Hotel, Rabbi Cooper said in the last two months hate attacks against Jews around the world have spiralled upward. Yet, "we can't get the international community or the media to focus on this. That is a depressing and frightening development because it will set a precedent, that it has the potential to be open season on Jews."

In France, he pointed out, some synagogues were attacked two or three times before police stepped up security. "That kind of signal can be a disaster," he said. (In Edmonton, a synagogue was attacked twice within a few weeks.)

Jewish leaders "across the board, collectively" have failed to raise this issue sufficiently and convince their governments "to see the source of these crimes. The source is outside Canada," he said.

The Wiesenthal Centre has taken a number of steps to address the issue. Senior officials of the Centre met recently in New York with UN Secretary General Kofi Annan. They urged him to ensure the Security Council Commission investigating Mideast violence would also look into the attacks on Jews and Jewish institutions around the world.

The Centre also called on the U.S. administration to review its relationship with the UN Human Rights Commission in the wake of a recent resolution condemning Israel for war crimes and crimes against humanity.

And in a letter to Annan, the Centre stated "there is no question the recent votes by the UN Security Council, General Assembly and Human Rights Commission, which unjustly blame Israel for the current Middle East violence, have only worsened the situation and helped unleash a shocking spate of anti-Semitism and hate crimes around the world during the Jewish High Holy Days... I urge you to convene the Security Council in order to condemn these horrific acts and to demand that members of the international community and related agencies take all necessary measures against the vilification of the Jewish people and their historic link to the Holy Land."

Spelling out the international scope of the problem, Rabbi Cooper said British and German racists have thrown their support behind the Palestinians. A Web site called Radio Islam, based in Sweden, showcases the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a Czarist forgery that claims Jews are conspiring to dominate the world. The site "has little to do with Islam and more to do with promoting hate," he said.

A pro-Nazi site, aimed at German Web surfers, has been set up in California by an Islamic group "as part of a strategy to denigrate Israel and Jews." The site would be illegal if hosted in Germany, he said.

About 400 to 500 racist Web sites hosted on U.S.-based computers target a European audience. The centre uses moral suasion to convince ISPs they are not obliged to carry these Web sites, he said, adding that Canadian ISPs have been more co-operative in removing racist materials.

Kalle, meanwhile, said when Pathway removed a racist site in 1996, "all hell broke out." He received hate mail and threats, and hackers tried to break into the company's server computers.

Nevertheless, he maintained his view that ISPs should not host "unacceptable content such as hatred or pornography."

JVS strike continues as employees reject latest offer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Employees of Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) are still picketing, following rejection of two offers last week. At issue are wages and Jewish holidays.

CUPE Local 2137 members "overwhelmingly rejected" the latest offer, which included an offer of a 1 percent pay raise after ratification and 1 percent the following year, said Tia De Agazio, CUPE Local 2137 president.

The retroactive pay raise and greater increases the union is demanding – that's not "money that we have," said Karen Goldenberg, JVS executive director.

Empowered women can accomplish much: Eisen

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like other causes that touch Jewish hearts, the struggle to win emigration rights for Jews from what was then the Soviet Union, "attracted strong capable women and empowered them," said Wendy Eisen.

Eisen, who was one of the first Canadian women to take part in that campaign, was speaking at a program of the Chabad Lubavitch of Markham sisterhood, honouring "Women Who Make a Difference."

With role models like Henrietta Szold, the founder of Hadassah; poet and partisan martyr Hannah Senesh; and, especially, Golda Meir, small groups of women, called "the 35s," called attention to the plight of the refuseniks.

In the early 1970s, she said, Elie Weisel's book The Jews of Silence, brought attention to the plight of Soviet Jews who were being hounded out of public office and universities, and physically assaulted.

Shortly after, several Jews declared their wish to go to Israel. "Somehow, in the desolation that was the Soviet Union, they had developed a Jewish soul," Eisen said.

She reminisced about the tactics the groups of 35s used, such as demonstrating outside the Soviet consulate in Montreal dressed in black, or on crutches with bloodstained bandages.

When the Bolshoi Ballet appeared, they bought a block of tickets in the front of the hall, and, just before the performance started, stood up and walked out – leaving one sole demonstrator, dressed as a prisoner.

"The press paid more attention to us than to the Bolshoi," Eisen said.

Demonstrating even had its humorous side, said Eisen, remembering the time she borrowed a coffin from a funeral home to make a point in front of the Soviet consulate. So successful was it, that the group decided to do it again the next day, and asked her to keep the coffin in her station wagon.

On the way home, she went grocery shopping. "Just think of the reaction of the boy carrying my bags out to the car," she laughed.

Because of "the power of Jewish women," she said, noted refusenik Ida Nudel is in Israel, heading an organization for single mothers; Ida Milgrom is enjoying being a safta (grandmother) to son Natan Sharansky's children; Lev Forman is living in Ranana; and Elena Case is working as a translator.

"We helped pave the way for the largest aliyah movement in history: seven million people from the former Soviet Union have come to Israel – 4 to 5,000 a month."

The seven women who were honoured during the evening ranged from 21-year-old Ryerson student Rivanna Stuhler, who volunteers for the Out of the Cold program and at the Daily Bread Food Bank, to Thea Abramson, matriarch to a four-generation family, and chair of SAJAC, The Southern African Jewish Association of Canada.

Other honourees were esthetician Bev Chait; shul activist Faye Rewald; and SAJAC News editor and also shul worker Heather Super. Chabad Lubavitch of Markham rebbitzens Goldie Plotkin and Esther Gitlin were also honoured.

The honourees, according to event chair Jennifer Teitelbaum, all of whom are immigrants to Canada, are noted for their hospitality and warmth, as well as their support for other more recent immigrants.

The women were nominated by members of the shul community. The seven finalists were chosen by a committee consisting of Wendy Eisen, Rebbitzen Joyce Tradburks of Kehillat Shaarei Torah congregation, and Marika Levine. Many of the comments about the nominees were included in the program.

Each of the seven women was given a yellow rose, an inscribed vase, and a copy of Eisen's book, Count Me In.

Ron Bolotin: Sheer Determination

Five days before Ron Bolotin's 19th birthday, while on training exercises in the Sinai, he stepped on a land mine. Ron lost his right leg and his eyes were so severely damaged, he feared he would never see again. But luck was on his side — the surgeons saved his sight, and he was fitted with a prosthesis to replace his right leg.

Before joining the army, Ron's passion was competitive swimming. Six months after receiving his prosthesis, he was ready to enter the water again. He trained at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv, and with the help of the highly specialized rehabilitation staff, he became a swimming instructor for disabled children.

Ron has won many medals in disabled swimming championships all over the world and recently successfully represented Israel at the Paralympics in Sydney, Australia.

He says he could have never returned to a normal life, had it not been for the outstanding help he received at the Beit Halochem Centre. "Beit Halochem is my lifeline; there's no question about that."

Workers needed for the Jewish Renaissance

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

CHICAGO — Until she was more than halfway through her Jewish studies program at the University of Judaism, Richmond, B.C. native Faye Hammer had no idea of the range of career opportunities in Jewish education.

Speaking on a panel at the recent General Assembly of United Jewish Communities in Chicago, Hammer, 24, now a teacher at Chicago's Sager Solomon Schechter Day School, spoke of her own career path and the options still available to her.

Among the other speakers at the Jewish Renaissance and Renewal Workshop – titled The Chronic Crisis of Personnel... Where Will Our Teachers (and Youth Workers, and Counsellors, and...) Come From? – were Alex Pomson, director of the Jewish Teacher Training program at York University, and Washington, D.C.-based Jay Rubin, executive vice-president of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, which has over 100 North American affiliates.

In addition to Hebrew schools and Jewish day schools, Hammer said Jewish education means Jewish community centres, Jewish federations, Israel trips, summer camps and adult education.

"This whole new world opened up to me. I realized I could be principal of a Jewish day school, or I could run a summer camp, or I could work for a Hebrew school, among many, many other things."

Hammer graduated in May with a master's degree in Jewish education from the University of Judaism in Los Angeles.

Her degree qualifies her as a teacher and administrator, as well as "a million other possibilities," she said. Some day, she hopes to be principal of a day school.

Currently she teaches Grade 7 rabbinics and Jewish history. "I love it," she said, although she admitted that the salary is relatively low.

She would not be averse to working in Canada, she told The CJN in a subsequent interview. But having studied in the United States, and with friends in Chicago, she is happy where she is.

The days when there were only one or two majors as entrée to a Jewish community career are long gone, noted Rubin.

Moderator Louise Stoll, executive vice-president and chief operating officer of United Jewish Communities (UJC), the umbrella for North American Jewish federations under whose auspices the GA was held, noted the need for Jewish community professionals to have "modern business and management skills."

She also spoke of a "crisis in personnel in Jewish communal life."

Alan Sandler, Toronto's Jewish federation president, who was in the audience, agreed. Referring to the multi-million dollar Jewish "campus" to be built just north of Toronto to house a multitude of Jewish services, he predicted what a challenge it would be to find new staff.

A GA delegate from Omaha, Neb. emphasized how much more difficult it is in a small community.

Pomson, of York University, discussed a western Canadian initiative, undertaken jointly with York's Jewish Teacher Training program, to address that problem.

The Western Canadian Coalition of Jewish Educators, represented in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Calgary – which have day schools but no comparable training programs – is making scholarship grants available for Western Canadian students to take the York program.

That is a "far-sighted notion," said Pomson.

Students practice teach in both Toronto and western Canadian schools, and are expected to commit to three years of teaching in a western Canadian day school.

Many students in the Jewish Teacher Education program could never have imagined themselves as working in Jewish education, said Pomson, but took the program to increase their options. By the time they graduated, however, many found themselves "absolutely convinced they had a role to play in the day school system."

In Pomson's experience at least half the students enter the program only because someone has suggested the possibility to them.

Until recently the Jewish community has not been recruiting on campus, said Rubin.

Two years ago, a joint recruitment campaign was launched by Hillel, UJC, JESNA (the acronym for Jewish Educational Services of North America, the Jewish Federation system's educational co-ordinating, planning and development agency), the JCC association and the Federation for Jewish Camping, but most Jewish students didn't know it existed, Rubin said.

Now recruitment has extended to the corporate world. After two to three years in the work world, noted Rubin, some people are looking for more meaning in their lives and decide to apply their business skills to "Jewish renaissance."

Campus career counsellors may not know about careers in the Jewish community, Rubin noted. Even one of his own children, when asked, "What does your father do?" answered, "He goes to a lot of meetings."

For students who may be interested in Jewish community careers, Rubin recommended looking at fellowship opportunities or taking a job at a Jewish camp or as a youth worker.

Asper family makes $20M donation to two groups

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Asper family is donating $10 million each to the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and the Winnipeg Foundation.

The Asper gift, announced at a press conference last week, is the largest such donation either foundation has ever received and one of the largest personal gifts in Winnipeg's history.

Israel Asper, whose business empire includes television and radio stations on three continents and now Conrad Black's Canadian newspapers, has promised there will be more in the future.

"My father and our entire family are very pleased to be in a position to make this substantial contribution to these two important foundations in our community," Gail Asper said at the press conference.

"We see our role as just one of many participants who are committed to making Winnipeg and Manitoba a better and stronger community."

For the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, one of the most successful such Jewish organizations in North America, the Asper gift increases its assets by a third.

"It will expand our capacity to support projects and community services that will assure the continuity of a vibrant Jewish community in this province," said Justice Guy Kroft, president of the Jewish Foundation.

"This gift will enable us to continue to be a partner in philanthropy with other charitable organizations that serve all citizens of this province."

Speaking for the Winnipeg Foundation, chair Helen Hayles said that "the Asper family is again demonstrating the remarkable generosity to this community for which they have become known.

"We are deeply grateful for this gift. Mr. Asper has said many times that giving back to the communities that contributed to the family success is a pillar of their philosophy. This gift is a tangible demonstration of that and a fine example to all Winnipeggers."

Both foundations will invest the proceeds and use a portion of the investment income generated every year to fund community projects. The gifts will grow in perpetuity to generate a minimum $1 million annually that will be distributed in the community. Together, the two foundations distributed a total of $9 million this year to community initiatives.

The 80-year-old Winnipeg Foundation has a capital base of over $215 million. The 36-year-old Jewish Foundation now has a capital base of $42 million with the Asper contribution.

Coast to Coast

Jewish world defensive in current Mideast crisis

Here in Canada, at Concordia University, Palestinians harass Jewish students, then get the student union to condemn the Hillel Jewish student centre as "racist" for giving out literature they dislike.

The Jewish response has been disorganized and dismaying, sometimes too aggressive, often too passive. This reflects our own feelings of confusion. Prime Minister Ehud Barak's reactions have helped popularize the Hebrew word l'zagzeg, to zigzag. It is easy to criticize him, but it is also easy to empathize. There are some days when I feel that we could solve this problem with the right formula, the right concessions. And there are some nights when I am sure that we face another century of war and the only response is an iron fist.

The ambivalence is understandable, even laudable. This is not 1948 or 1967 or 1973. Today, Israel has power. With power comes moral dilemmas, complexity, confusion.

Unfortunately, ham-handedness compounds the confusion. At the recent General Assembly in Chicago for 6,500 Jewish leaders, the Israeli Foreign Ministry had a booth running two videos simultaneously. One offered a bloody parade of images from the violence. The second was a cliché-ridden series of Havah Nagilah images of happy Israelis. A handout – in broken English – asked what people were "interesting" in receiving: "Beautiful Israel" or "Palestinian Violence In Israel." Such laughably false choices insult the intelligence of all North Americans. One Israeli grumbled, "The person responsible for this should not just be reprimanded, but should be shipped home, tomorrow!"

Here in Canada, our track record is not much better. While many in the Montreal Jewish community have pounced on any slightly critical fact the Montreal Gazette publishes, for weeks we let our Jewish students at Concordia languish. We should have helped immediately, teaching the students to distinguish between heated rhetoric which is acceptable and verbal threats which are not. They, by themselves, without "grownups," should have documented every incident of harassment, used tape recorders and video cameras at the Hillel tables where Palestinians were abusive, and forced the entire Concordia community to demonstrate zero tolerance for intolerance, to uphold the civility so essential to the educational process.

Unfortunately, just as the Israelis have been on the defensive, constantly responding to Palestinian violence, the Jewish world has been defensive too. We need to learn from that master politician Bill Clinton. Clinton understood the art of political ju-jitsu, the need to turn an opponent's attack against the opponent. When Republicans yelled "immorality," Clinton demonized Ken Starr.

Similarly, we must change the terms of the current debate. We cannot let the Palestinians once again name the conflict. Calling it the Al Aksa intifadah resurrects the romance and international legitimacy of the last intifadah, while blaming everything on Ariel Sharon's alleged "violation" of the Temple Mount. We should find a catchier name, such as the Oslo Rejection, the Peace Repudiation, Arafat's Last War, the Rejectionist Riots. We need to have eloquent Israeli soldiers emerge from behind their riot gear and share their anguish with the world, even as they resolve to defend their homeland. We need to popularize Yasser Arafat's statements rejecting peace, Palestinian religious leaders' call for war, and Israel's willingness to negotiate.

We also have to set conditions for the debate. Both sides should feel free to criticize the other, but not to delegitimize. Our own internal critics, who flaunt their Jewishness to attract attention, tend to condemn Israel itself whenever they dislike some aspect of Israeli policy.

We must stop being like Bontsha Shveigs, the long-suffering silent Diaspora character who only requested bread and water. After Canada voted for that one-sided UN resolution condemning Israel, we should have not only asked for an apology. We should have asked why the Liberal majority would never condemn Arafat and other Palestinian leaders for "encouraging the violence." A measure like that passed the U.S. Congress 365 to 30.

Even more important than our propaganda skirmishes, we need to deepen our own relationships with Israel. More than Jewish crusaders, Israel needs committed Jewish friends. Sadly, many Jewish students know their Eminem from their REM (rock trivia) but they don't know their 1948 from their 242 (the year Israel was established versus the UN resolution passed after the Six Day War). We need teach-ins and books. We need to see our schools devoting more time to Zionist education. And we need this to be true education, acknowledging the complexities and the counter-arguments, not one-sided propaganda.

But the challenge is emotional as well as intellectual. We need to solidify our ties with the Jewish State. We need to plan new trips to Israel, not cancel them at the first whiff of trouble. We need to embrace our embattled brethren there, right now, so they will not feel abandoned.

In that spirit, I propose that all of us, in our homes and in our organizations, in our schools and in our shuls, adopt one of the over two dozen Israelis who have been killed recently. That is two dozen worlds destroyed, leaving relatives and friends grieving. We should adopt one family, and learn one victim's name and story. We should send money and letters and cards and pictures and invitations to visit. We should envelop these unfortunate mourners in a collective group hug from the entire Jewish people. This is not about politics. It is not about who started or who is right and wrong. It's about friendship. It's about mentschlichkeit. And it's about time we started.

Alberta government passes Yom Hashoah bill

By JUDY SHAPIRO
CJN Correspondent

EDMONTON — Holocaust survivor Terry Groner left the Alberta legislature Nov. 16 feeling that she had witnessed something very important.

What she had just observed was the passage of Bill 26, Alberta's Holocaust Memorial Day and Genocide Remembrance Act, which enshrines Yom Hashoah, as observed on the Jewish calendar, as a provincial day of remembrance.

Alberta is the eighth Canadian province to enact such legislation.

Recognizing the singular nature of the Nazi persecution of the Jewish people, the act calls on Albertans to use Yom Hashoah as a day to reflect on the lessons of the Holocaust, to educate on the perils of hatred and to consider other instances of genocide, persecution and racism, and to reaffirm their commitment to upholding human rights.

It was an emotional and moving day for the 59 Calgarians who travelled to Edmonton for the event. They were joined in the visitor's gallery of the legislature by about 30 Jewish Edmontonians.

Many observers felt that they had been a part of history in the making.

"I am very proud to live here and be a part of Canada and Alberta," said Groner.

Among the spectators were at least 35 Holocaust survivors, eight of whom have been honoured by the Canadian government for their contributions to Canadian life.

For the survivors, seeing the passage of a bill that recognizes their suffering and enjoins Albertans to learn the lessons of the Holocaust was a momentous occasion.

But the importance of the bill was not lost on the members of the legislature either. In what was a unique process for the Alberta legislature, the bill passed all three readings in one sitting, with unanimous support of all MLAs.

The tone of the debate and the overall atmosphere was unusually respectful and quiet.

Ron Stevens, the Calgary MLA who drafted and introduced the bill, referred to the debate as "affirmative and uplifting."

The honour of speaking first to the bill was given to Premier Ralph Klein.

After quoting from author Elie Wiesel, Klein said, "For the survivors of the Holocaust, such as Elie Wiesel, even to speak of what they endured has always been very painful, more painful than most of us can imagine. But speak of it they do, with courage and thoughtfulness, and across the world many people have heard these voices and learned the sombre lessons these survivors can teach.

"These voices do more than help us remember. They remind us that respect for one another and respect for the diversity of human life can never be taken for granted. They compel us to resolve even more strongly to be vigilant in the protection of human life and dignity.

"This act will serve to strengthen Albertans' resolve to speak out in the face of persecution and to help those people who need their help. We hope the act will help to make the voices of survivors of all forms of persecution ring even more loudly and eloquently across the province. If the act can help achieve these goals, then perhaps the millions of victims will not have perished in vain."

Speakers representing the other parties acknowledged that the Holocaust was unique and unparalleled in history. However, several MLAs mentioned other groups who were targeted for persecution by the Nazis: gays and lesbians, the disabled, Gypsies, political dissidents, Slavs, and Soviet prisoners of war.

Others remembered additional incidences of genocide in the 20th century, including events in Armenia, Cambodia, Yugoslavia and Rwanda. Several commented that Alberta, too, is not immune from discrimination and intolerance.

But all stressed that in observing Yom Hashoah the lessons to be learned from the tragedy of the Holocaust will be preserved.

Although the bill passed without opposition, its introduction was not without controversy. One week earlier, when the government announced its intention to pass the bill, members of the Ukrainian and Muslim communities protested the title of the act.

Originally, the bill was to be called the Holocaust Memorial Day-Yom Hashoah Act. In response to protests, the Conservative caucus decided to broaden the intent of the bill by changing it to the Holocaust Memorial Day and Genocide Remembrance Act.

However, the wording of the bill itself remained unchanged and its final paragraph reads: "Yom Hashoah, the Day of Holocaust as determined in each year by the Jewish lunar calendar, is proclaimed as Holocaust Memorial Day – Yom Hashoah."

Although some in the Jewish community were disappointed with the name change, most chose to focus instead on the importance of the bill's passage.

Egyptian acquitted in bomb plot

MONTREAL — An Egyptian refugee was acquitted of planning to bomb the Israeli consulate after a Quebec Court judge found the RCMP's chief witness not credible.

Judge Gilles Cadieux decided that Tarek Khafagy, 30, who at one point in this four-week trial was suspected of being connected with the Hezbollah terrorist group, was likely framed because of a financial dispute with Aymon Bondok, the Nepean, Ont. man, on whom the RCMP based much of its case.

It was Egyptian-born Bondok who called the police informing them that there was a bomb in Khafagy's apartment. Bondok also confessed that it was he who called the Israeli Consulate threatening to blow it up unless Israel freed Lebanese prisoners and then phoned the police fingering Khafagy.

It appears Bondok owed Khafagy money and wanted him deported from Canada to get out of paying it.

Khafagy was arrested in March and spent five months in prison.

In Egypt, Khafagy paid Bondok $6,000 US to get him immigration papers. On Bondok's advice, Khafagy instead claimed refugee status on the grounds that he had renounced Islam to become a Christian and was being persecuted.

Upon arriving in Canada, Khafagy demanded his money back. After repaying $1,200, Bondok apparently wanted to be free of the debt and concocted a scheme to get Khafagy thrown out of the country.

Bondok confessed that it was he who hid material to make an explosive in Khafagy's apartment.

Khafagy testified that he had no knowledge of the bomb or any plot against the Israeli Consulate.

Bondok was given a suspended sentence, after spending six months behind bars, in exchange for testifying against Khafagy.

A post-election primer

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Conventional wisdom – based upon the numerous polls that have helped us keep score during the election campaign – indicates that little has really changed in the overall political landscape.

At the writing of this column, election day is still in the future. But regardless of how the election turns out (we'll offer our analysis over the next couple of weeks), there are some steps that individuals and groups within the Jewish community should consider.

Write, phone, fax or e-mail the winning candidates in your locale and congratulate them on their victory. Now that the contrived atmosphere of the campaign is over, tell them that you hope to meet with them soon to share your thoughts and concerns.

Write, phone, fax or e-mail the losing candidates in your locale and praise them for having had the courage to stand for election – even if you did not support them or their parties. Taking a run for Parliament turns a person's life upside down and losing an election can be a crushing experience. Acknowledging the emotional toll on the candidate is not only the decent thing to do... it will also long be remembered.

We have had occasion in the past to observe that politics is all about relationships. The two initiatives described above would take the average person no more than an hour, but the dividends are potentially great.

Sometimes we forget that politicians (for the most part) are just regular people who respond to the same stimuli as the rest of us. Thoughtfulness and kindness will yield a similarly thoughtful and kind response when it is you, your issue or your community that is in need. This approach may sound self-serving and perhaps it is. Still, it is one of the most effective ways to get a politician's attention.

Once the dust has settled, be prepared to write, phone, fax or e-mail your MP every few months – even if you don't have a pressing issue to raise. Comment on a recent statement by the MP or an initiative with which she or he was involved. Pass on an FYI or a suggestion on how to approach an emerging issue.

The point is to establish and maintain contact with your MP on a routine basis, so that when you do need his or her support, your efforts will not have been completely exhausted simply getting in the door.

It may not be especially sexy, but try it... you'll be amazed at how receptive most MP's will be to your endeavours.

"These are the things for which no limit is prescribed - the practice of loving-kindness."

Soldier killed by bomb at Har Dov

By SHARON GAL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The air force attacked several Hezbollah targets Sunday after one soldier was killed and two wounded when a roadside bomb exploded near the Lebanese border.

Sgt. Maj. Khalil Taher, 27, of Acre, was killed. A second soldier was moderately injured and the third lightly injured. Hezbollah claimed responsibility for the bombing.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak said Israel will file a complaint against Lebanon with the United Nations Security Council over the bombing. Barak told the cabinet that such acts of terrorism are meant to break the nation's spirit, and that Israel must stand firm.

Lebanon said yesterday that it is planning its own complaint to the UN over Israel's shelling of Lebanese targets.

"Israel's acts of aggression are a violation of UN Resolution 425," declared President Emile Lahoud.

According to the IDF, the bomb was placed in Israeli territory, about a kilometre south of the international border. The UN supports Israel's definition of the border, but Hezbollah claims that this area – near the Shaba farm in the Har Dov sector – is Lebanese soil.

The IDF is bracing for more such attacks in the future.

Taher, a Bedouin scout, is the first soldier to be killed in the north since the IDF left Lebanon six months ago.

Following the incident, the air force attacked Hezbollah targets in southern Lebanon, for the first time since the withdrawal six months ago. Six Hezbollah outposts were attacked, including one whose members, according to information received by the IDF, helped to plan and execute the bombing. IDF cannons also fired dozens of shells at the region. According to Lebanese sources, one civilian – a Syrian construction worker – was lightly injured.

About two weeks ago, Hezbollah set off another bomb in the same region, and last month, it kidnapped three soldiers from the area. The idea of taking measures that would force Hezbollah to move farther away from Israel has been raised in the Northern Command. The organization's outposts are now right on the border.

Taher is survived by his wife, who is in the advanced stages of pregnancy, a year-old son, his parents, eight brothers and three sisters.

Taher was wounded in the right leg last year while serving in the north, but he insisted on continuing to serve in the area despite his family's pleas that he transfer elsewhere.

Taher "wanted to serve in the army, because he is in the State of Israel," said his father, Mohammed, who was himself a volunteer with the Israel Police. "He always said he was happy with his service."

Mohammed said his sons wanted to serve because "this is their country.

"I beg of Israel and its leaders, of Prime Minister Ehud Barak, of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and also of the king of Jordan and the president of Syria, to make peace," Mohammed said. "Enough of sending cattle to the slaughterhouse – because human beings are not cattle. God created man so that he would live."

Ben-Ami to push for signing of war-crimes tribunal agreement

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami plans to discuss with Prime Minister Ehud Barak Israel's signing of an international war-crimes pact.

Ben-Ami has directed ministry officials to prepare for Israel's signing the pact, which would establish an international war-crimes tribunal.

Israel has until the end of the year 2000 to decide whether it will sign. Such a signature would only be a symbolic statement of assent. Yet if Israel were to join the international court, next year it would have to carry out a complicated ratification process that would entail changes in some domestic laws.

Ben-Ami and Justice Minister Yossi Beilin recently decided to collaborate in an effort to promote Israel's signing the pact. But officials in the security establishment and Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein oppose Israel's signing the document.

Until now, Israel has refused to sign because the tribunal's draft constitution includes Jewish settlement activity in occupied territories on its list of war crimes. This settlement clause was incorporated as a result of Syrian and Egyptian lobbying.

Another clause in the war-crimes tribunal's draft constitution that has also dampened enthusiasm for the pact is a demand that classified military information be submitted in accord with any future tribunal request.

It was, however, the court constitution's settlement clause that forced Israel to oppose the pact two years ago, when it was first signed by member countries.

The Israel Defence Forces has consistently objected to Israel's signing the pact.

Egypt holds on to role in peace talks

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Egypt has asked Israel to undertake confidence-building measures in order to ameliorate the difficulties experienced by the Palestinian population in the territories.

The request came during a meeting Sunday between Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Danny Yatom, senior adviser to Prime Minister Ehud Barak on security and foreign policy.

In their meeting, held at the Presidential Palace in Cairo, Mubarak urged the Israeli government to show the Palestinian people a change in its behaviour toward them and pave the way for Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to respond with similar gestures.

The meeting between the senior Israeli official and the Egyptian president lasted an hour, and Yatom sought to update Mubarak on the situation on the ground from Israel's point of view.

The Israeli initiative followed last week's visit to Cairo by former president Ezer Weizman for a meeting with Mubarak, in which Weizman formed the impression that the Egyptian leader had only a partial picture of the situation in the territories.

Yatom brought charts and data to the meeting showing the Israel Defence Forces' deployment around Palestinian towns and villages and the numbers of dead and injured during nearly two months of violence in the territories.

Mubarak told his guest that Arafat is interested in an end to the violence in the territories and a return to a dialogue with Israel.

The Egyptian president also explained his decision to recall Egypt's ambassador to Tel Aviv, Mohammed Bassiouni, to Cairo for consultations, saying that given the circumstances he "had no choice." However, Mubarak added that the decision "has no substantive implications on Egyptian-Israeli relations or on Egypt's involvement and contribution to the peace process."

Yatom told Mubarak that Israel would like to see Egypt continue to play a role in the peace process. Nonetheless, there was no mention of Bassiouni returning to the embassy in Tel Aviv in the foreseeable future.

In another development, a senior diplomatic source in Jerusalem said Sunday that Prime Minister Ehud Barak has decided to opt for diplomatic means to end the crisis with the Palestinians.

The source added that Israel may be willing to consider the deployment of international observers if there is a noticeable decrease in the violence in the territories.

The week in Israel

Nov. 20

• The Knesset education committee called on the Education Ministry to ban a controversial modern history book that critics say ignores seminal events in the history of Israel, including the Holocaust, Zionism and the founding of the State. The ministry's director general said she would create a team to examine the complaints and suggest corrections.

Nov. 21

• UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan met with Israeli and Palestinian envoys on the possible deployment of a UN observer force to help quell violence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The talks came amid reports that Israel is reconsidering its earlier opposition to such a force.

Nov. 22

• A car bomb exploded in Hadera, killing two people and wounding at least 25 others.

• Egypt's ambassador to Israel, Mohammed Basiouny, returned home for an unspecified period of time.

Nov. 23

• Two soldiers, Lt. Edward Mechnick, 21 from Beersheva, and Sgt. Samer Hussein, 19, from Hurfeish, were killed yesterday in separate incidents in the Gaza strip; three others were injured. The IDF attributed the fatal attacks to members of the Palestinian Authority's Mohammed Dahlan's Preventive Security Organization.

Nov. 24

• Justice Minister Yossi Beilin announced that Israel is establishing a body to fight money laundering after receiving complaints from numerous financial institutions in other countries that it is not doing enough to combat the problem.

CIC holds Canada to account on UN vote

It said these resolutions, passed by lower-level committees, regard Israeli towns in the Golan Heights as illegal settlements, and refer to Israeli settlements as occupied, including Jerusalem – "implying the whole city is Palestinian."

The article appeared four days before the federal election, in which Canada's support for UN Resolution 1322 was a hot, sometimes divisive issue in six Toronto-area ridings with large Jewish constituencies, all held by Liberals – at least as of The CJN's Monday morning deadline.

While the CIC questioned the importance and newness of these votes, it did note its concern.

In a prepared statement, national chair Joseph Wilder expressed the CIC's "disappointment that once again, the United Nations General Assembly opted for a biased and prejudicial approach to the ongoing Middle East dispute.

"By introducing and passing resolutions at the committee level that reflect an unbalanced and prejudicial approach to the Middle East, the UN system has allowed the Palestinian leadership to avoid assuming responsibility for the ongoing crisis and its resolution through direct negotiations with Israel.

"The Canada-Israel Committee, along with its partner organizations, fully expects the government of Canada to withhold its support for any and all of the resolutions that are either one-sided or reflect a lack of balance. Moreover, any UN resolution – in the General Assembly or other UN agencies – that characterizes the disputed territories in a pre-judgmental manner (e.g., 'occupied Palestinian territories') should be disqualified from consideration for support by Canada.

"The commitment we received from Prime Minister [Jean] Chrétien following Canada's regrettable vote for UN Security Council Resolution 1322 was that he would ensure that the government will not support any resolutions that are either one-sided, unbalanced or pre-judgmental.

"We fully expect that when the offensive resolutions referred to in [the Post] come before the UN General Assembly, Canada will honour the prime minister's word and not support them," the CIC stated.

Privately, some Jewish communal leaders said the Post story should be viewed in light of the paper's open disdain for the Liberals and unabashed, often full-throated support for the Canadian Alliance. They also questioned the article's placement and timing. One representative of a national Jewish organization grumbled that the paper was "underhandedly" using Jews and Israel as a political football.

Rob Ritter, the CIC's national executive director, said the resolutions described in the story are not new, and that Canada's voting pattern over the years on the same items has "always [been] the same." He said nations are not obliged to vote the same way in the General Assembly as they do in committees.

The Post story did not state that Canada's official policy since the end of the 1967 Six Day War is that the West Bank, Golan Heights and eastern Jerusalem are occupied by Israel, and that Jewish settlements in those areas are obstacles to peace. Canada's UN voting record has often reflected that position. Neither did the paper interview anyone from the CIC.

The next day, a Post editorial said the Liberals issued a "tendentious" press release defending their actions on the grounds that the resolutions were "technical and procedural." The paper stood by its story.

But Foreign Affairs minister John Manley, in a letter to Post editor-in-chief Kenneth Whyte, a copy of which was obtained by The CJN, said the story, bolstered by a "misleading" headline, made "several false accusations," and as a result, "belittles a matter of great importance: Canada's support for the State of Israel and our desire to see it live in peace with its neighbours."

Manley's letter went on to defend Canadian Mideast policy, and cited a Nov. 22 statement by the Israeli ambassador to the UN that praised Canada. The Post's story contained "nothing that's new," flatly stated David Goldberg, CIC's director of research and education. He said the measures referred to, while not favourable to Israel, are "perfunctory" votes routinely passed at UN committees.

Goldberg added that the allegations in the piece would have escaped notice altogether were it not for Canada's support for Resolution 1322.

While the measures supported by Canada "are discomforting, Israel doesn't lose sleep over them, and neither should we."

He noted that not even UN members consider these draft resolutions important; nearly 60 countries did not participate in the voting. "Far more important" are votes at the UN's General Assembly and 15-member Security Council.

However, the CIC does not quibble with Canada's voting as described in the Post story. Canada did, in fact, vote in favour of 10 measures, including on the right of Palestinians to "return to their homes;" on describing Israeli settlements in the "Occupied Palestinian Territory, including Jerusalem, and the Occupied Syrian Golan" as "illegal;" calling on all Israeli settlement activity to cease; and calling on Israel to implement measures to prevent "illegal acts of violence" by Jewish settlers and to guarantee the safety of Palestinian civilians.

The same resolutions "come forward every year," Goldberg noted, and "the language is completely consistent with previous years."

Ottawa also voiced support for more mundane measures, such as scholarships for Palestinian refugees.

By contrast, the United States opposed eight measures, voted for one and abstained from two.

Canada abstained on one contentious measure that condemned Israel's "excessive use of force," deplored Israeli policies and practices "which violate the human rights of the Palestinian people," and demanded that Israel comply with an investigation into the current violence.

Canada explained its abstention by saying it "question[s] the benefit to the peace process of what we view as unhelpful references to acts by only one side."

The CIC also pointed out that last week, Canada voted against a UN measure calling for the establishment of an inquiry into "grave breaches of humanitarian law by Israel in the occupied Palestinian territories."

The resolution, put forth by the UN's Commission on Human Rights, passed by a vote of 21 for, 19 against and 11 abstentions.

Canada called the measure "unbalanced," saying efforts should instead focus on persuading the parties to end the violence and resume negotiations.

Arabs needed in high-tech

By ORI NIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A new initiative to integrate Arab citizens into Israel's high-tech industry was launched last week at a conference organized by the Jewish-Arab Economic Development Centre in Herzliyah.

The goal of the gathering was to tout the potential of university-educated Arab Israelis for local high-tech industries. Representatives from a number of large high-tech firms participated in the conference, among them Motorola, NetVision and Microsoft.

Mohammad Zuabi, the Jewish-Arab centre's technology co-ordinator, said that there are at least 1,000 Arab university graduates with degrees in the relevant high-tech fields in Israel.

Zuabi said that most of them are ready to be absorbed into the industry without any further training, while a small number require minor additional training in order to fit into specific fields.

Currently, there are only 300 Arab Israelis working in Israel's high-tech industries, which employ over 70,000 people. Approximately 30 percent of the Arabs working in high-tech are employed by Intel.

According to data presented at the conference, in the past four years only 60 Arab Israelis completed university degrees in high-tech fields such as computer engineering. This year, however, there is a noticeable rise in the number of Arabs signing up for high-tech degree programs compared to the traditional fields generally chosen by Arab students, such as medicine, law and accounting.

According to Zuabi, the number of Arab students seeking high-tech training will only increase if the industry absorbs more Arab employees. Unemployment among Arab Israeli university graduates is a serious problem for the community and has impacted negatively on younger Arabs, who are not motivated to pursue post-secondary educations.

Turks offer to mediate

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Turkey has offered to mediate between Israel and the Palestinians until they reach some agreement.

Visiting Turkish Foreign Minister Ismail Cem made the offer last week when he met Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben Ami. Cem also met Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and then reported back to the prime minister and foreign minister that Arafat was willing to end the violence.

Cem emphasized that Turkey has no intention of usurping the mediation role from the United States in the peace process, but wants to work with the Americans in seeking bridging and compromise proposals.

Turkey has informed several European Union states of its willingness to become a mediator in the conflict because of its good relations with both Israel and the Palestinians. This is seen as a Turkish bid to take advantage of the vacuum created by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's gradual withdrawal as the unofficial mediator between Israel and the Palestinians.

Israeli diplomatic sources yesterday said Cem's decision to visit at this difficult time must be seen as a courageous step, intended to demonstrate to Israel and the Arab world the strength of the ties and friendship between Turkey and Israel.

However, it also indicates Turkey's concern over the consequences any escalation in violence could have on its future relations with Israel. The relations, including a strategic alliance between the two defence ministries, were established against the backdrop of the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians, and have been flourishing.

The trade balance between the two countries is currently $1 billion (US) and is expected to double or even triple in the next few years.

Egypt 'threatens' U.S.

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A top adviser to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak last week warned that the American administration "will lose much" if it continues to support Israel.

"If the United States agrees to cover for Israel and protect it from international law, American interests could be harmed," Osama Al Baz told Egyptian television.

This was the latest in a series of increasingly strongly worded declarations made by prominent Arab politicians against the United States. Calls for boycotting the U.S. for its "bias in favour of Israel" are no longer coming only from the more radical states in the region, but are now also being heard from Egypt and Jordan.

In recent days, Egyptian newspapers have called for a boycott of U.S. goods.

"We have to start approaching the political issues in a language of interests, not emotions," wrote the Al Ahram newspaper last week.

"The U.S. has huge, vital interests in the Middle East and as soon as Washington realizes that it must avoid true Arab anger in order to protect these interests, it won't hesitate to adopt less biased policy lines."

The Al Akhbar newspaper also attacked U.S. policy in the Middle East this week, charging that while the United States leaves its troops in the Persian Gulf, supposedly to protect oil-producing countries in the region, it is doing nothing to protect the Palestinians.

"How can [the United States] explain the events taking place in the occupied territories?" the newspaper asked. "How does Washington answer the question of who is going to protect the unarmed Palestinian nation from the oppressive Israeli might?"

Last Thursday, on its front page, Al Akhbar published an article in which the Israel Defence Forces was accused of neo-Nazi tactics and the United States was deemed responsible for Israel's "terrible crimes" against the Palestinians, because it supplies Israel with arms.

Amy Sky launches Phenomenal Songbird project

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "This is where we spent our wedding night," Amy Sky reminisced as we settled into the elegant Tea Room at the newly renovated Windsor Arms Hotel. "It will be 15 years on New Year's Eve."

The pop singer-songwriter is married to Marc Jordan, also a well-known songwriter. They have two children Zoe, 10, and Ezra, 7.

Over pots of tea, we chatted about many things, including her new Phenomenal Woman project, which is the theme of her brand new CD, a winter tour, a spring television special, and a cross-country search for phenomenal Canadian women.

A couple of years ago, Maya Angelou's famous poem, Phenomenal Woman, kept popping up repeatedly in her e-mail as a chain letter before she finally opened it.

"I thought – wow, I needed to put this up on my fridge, and say this to myself everyday.

"It's so affirming, I wanted to put it to music."

Sky's efforts to reach the poet through normal channels were unsuccessful until fate intervened. While appearing on the Dini Petty Show, she discovered that Angelou was also a guest.

"I knocked on her dressing room door, and sort of barged in and introduced myself. I told her that I wanted to set her poem to music.

"She looked me up and down, and said, 'You know Sky, I've always said that people are more alike than unalike. If you feel that strongly, then you have my permission.'

"She was surprised that no one had done it before."

The resulting CD is an entertaining mix of musical genres which include an Afro-Latin groove, a sitar, Irish pipe playing, Celtic fiddler Natalie MacMaster, and African singing sensation Angelique Kidjo.

Over the years, Reba McEntire, Diana Ross, Belinda Carlisle and Heart have recorded Sky's songs. In 1999, Anne Murray and Natalie MacMaster both scored chart singles with her songs.

The inspiration for the song Let There Be Love came from watching Anne Murray and her daughter Dawn Langstroth on TV discussing Dawn's battle with an eating disorder.

"When I wrote it," Sky said, "I never thought it would be a duet for both of them! I was just thinking about their struggle and that's where these lyrics came from.

"I think my whole spiritual point of view has obviously been hugely informed by my Jewish upbringing. I'm from a close-knit family, and among my siblings we range from Orthodox, to Conservative, to Reform, to my end of the spectrum – Alternative/Humanistic /New Age, although it sounds airy-fairy.

"The face of Judaism is evolving. We go to the Danforth Jewish Circle, which has very inclusive services. A woman leads the services. I actually sang the Kol Nidre this year. I also attended a couple of really interesting learning services at Kolel and I loved those! A really great rabbi led the classes, and he encouraged us to ask questions."

Amy Sky

How much of her work is autobiographical?

"The perfect marriage is one in which you have hard times… You have an opportunity to deconstruct, so that you can reconstruct.

"My mother is a family and marriage counsellor. She says that she's a shrink in a chair, and I'm a shrink on the air," Sky said.

"My maternal grandmother was well known in her community for singing Russian folksongs with her beautiful voice. People often ask me, because of my cheekbones, if I am an American Indian, and I say no, I'm a Canadian Jew. Family lore has it that, way back, there was a doctor in my family who cured the daughter of a Tatar chief.

"Then there was a marriage. I don't know if it was as a gift or if they fell in love, but all the people on my mother's side of the family, including myself, have the epicanthic fold that you only get in the eyes if you are Oriental.

"There's never a dull moment when you're a writer," Sky said. "I don't necessarily have to wait for something to occur in my life to be inspired. Although I have been known to put myself into emotionally loaded situations to observe my reactions. It's kind of the same work as an actor does – if there's no authenticity there, then there's no inspiration."

Paintings live to tell the tale

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"If I go down, do not let my paintings die," Felix Nussbaum told a friend in Brussels with whom he had entrusted his paintings in 1942, two years before he and his wife, Felka, were deported to Auschwitz. "Show them to the people."

Fifty-six years after his untimely death at the hands of the Nazis, Nussbaum's body of work is now hailed and celebrated, not only in Osnabruck, his birthplace in Germany, but in cities throughout the world where fine art is appreciated and savoured.

Nussbaum might have been a statistic rather than an icon had it not been for two dedicated men – the director of Osnabruck's cultural museum and its mayor.

These men rescued him from certain obscurity and oblivion by reclaiming and restoring his paintings and by building an addition to the museum in Osnabruck – Felix Nussbaum House – which displays about 200 of his works. This was an ironic and triumphant turn of fate, since Nussbaum was shunned by the townspeople during his lifetime.

In The Fear of Felix Nussbaum, a one-hour documentary to be aired by Vision TV on Wednesday, Dec. 6 at 9 p.m., Toronto filmmaker Jack Kuper, a Holocaust survivor, traces the trajectory of Nussbaum's short-lived career through the medium of his bold, melancholy paintings.

With his usual skill and sensitivity, Kuper shows how a relatively small town in western Germany finally came to terms with one of its Jewish sons.

Nussbaum was born in 1904 in a well-to-do, assimilated family. His father encouraged him to paint, but his mother was none too pleased by his artistic inclinations.

Self portrait of Felix Nussbaum

Influenced by Vincent van Gogh, Nussbaum developed his Expressionistic style in southern France. In 1928, he launched a one-man show in Berlin.

By 1931, Nussbaum was "the talk of Berlin," working on a series of commissions. But many of his paintings were lost in a fire in 1932.

With the rise of Adolf Hitler in 1933, Nussbaum and his girlfriend, a Polish Jew whom he would later marry, went into exile in Italy and then in Belgium. They lived in a succession of cities, all but dependent on handouts from friends and Nussbaum's parents.

Nussbaum felt isolated and wretched in Belgium, as there was no market to speak of for his paintings. Felka, his wife, eked out a living as a portrait painter.

During the German occupation of Belgium, the Nussbaums often changed hiding places and got by on forged ration cards.

Nussbaum poured his soul into his paintings, which documented the deprivations and horrors of the Holocaust.

Concerned that they might be confiscated and destroyed by the Germans, he gave them to a friend in Brussels, a dentist named Dr. Grosfils. After the war, Dr. Grosfils was reluctant to relinquish the cache, a story in itself.

Arrested in July 1944, the Nussbaums were shipped to their deaths on the last Belgian train bound for the Auschwitz concentration camp.

All but six Jews in Osnabruck, including Nussbaum's parents and his brother, were murdered.

For years after the war, his paintings mouldered away in Dr. Grosfils' basement, forgotten and seemingly doomed. When Wendelin Zimmer, an Osnabruck art critic, saw the decomposing pictures in 1969, he was appalled by their condition.

Twenty-five years would elapse before Osnabruck deigned to hold an international architectural competition for the design of the Felix Nussbaum House, a contest won by Daniel Libeskind, the designer of Berlin's Jewish Museum.

Built in 1998, the Felix Nussbaum House now stands as a soaring monument to a painter whose ample talents have been duly recognized.

Sometimes, justice prevails.

Doll House a humanist, not feminist play, actor says

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Actor Jordan Pettle views The Doll House as a "humanist play" rather than as a feminist one because Nora had to leave her husband and child behind to become "a moral, human being."

The 29-year-old actor is playing Nils Krogstad, the "heavy" in Henrik Ibsen's drama, a role for which he had to grow a beard.

When Ibsen's play was published in 1879 it created a shock in middle-class circles, a reaction which Jordan doesn't think would happen today, "because society has evolved."

The current production is the première of John Murrell's adaptation, which, according to Jordan, substitutes Canadian colloquialisms for arcane language.

Fiona Byrne and Ben Carlson play the couple whose marriage is headed for the rocks.

In The Doll's House, Krogstad blackmails Nora, after having committed forgery years ago, before he redeems himself. Pettle sees it as a meaty role.

It's the first time Pettle has acted in an Ibsen play, and he says Krogstad's role is as important to his career as his work in King Lear, Midsummer Night's Dream and Cherry Orchard at the Stratford Festival.

Jordan Pettle stars (here with Melee Hutton) in The Doll House.

Born in Toronto, the son of Naomi and Alvin Pettle, he attended Leaside High School, and after a year at the University of Toronto, he went on to the National Theatre School in Montreal and an acting career.

Jordan and his brother Adam will both be involved in Zadie's Shoes at the Factory Theatre in January.

Adam, the slightly younger brother, is the playwright, and Jordan is the play's lead, Benjamin. Their roles were reversed in Therac 25, a one-act play, which ran last year, based on Adam's successful fight against thyroid cancer.

The Doll's House is running at Canadian Stage, Upstairs, 26 Berkeley St., until Dec. 9. For information, call 416-368-3110.

Requiem for a Dream is a fetid slice of Brooklyn Jewish life

By RONALD CHARLES EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Brooklyn, N.Y., is closely linked with Jews, a connection that has inspired both Jewish and non-Jewish writers.

One of the latter, Brooklyn's Hubert Selby Jr., who wrote Requiem For A Dream, a gritty novel about Brooklyn Jewish junkies, has collaborated with independent film director Darren Aronofsky on a screen adaptation of his story. The film, rated "R," is currently playing in Toronto at the Cumberland theatre.

The film chronicles the lives of Sara Goldfarb (Ellen Burstyn), an elderly Jewish widow, and her son Harry (Jared Leto). Not surprisingly given the film's title, the anticipated American dream goes tragically awry.

When Sara receives an invitation to appear on her favourite infomercial, she has visions of fame. Harry, meanwhile, is out to make the big heroin deal along with his black street-hustler partner, Tyrone C. Love (Marlon Wayans).

The spiral downward begins when Sara's friend Ada (Louise Lasser) steers her to a "Dr. Feelgood," whose diet-pill regimen de-stabilizes her psyche. Meanwhile, Harry and Tyrone become junkies, just as a gang war cuts off the supply, forcing the pair to seek relief in a hostile South.

Harry's girlfriend, Marion Silver (Jennifer Connelly), a troubled Jewish bohemian who hopes to open a dress shop, runs out of money, forcing her to sleep with her former therapist, Arnold the Shrink (Sean Gullette), and with Little John (Keith David), a pimp with a sinister agenda.

Although rife with the expected horrors that accompany addictive drugs, Requiem for a Dream nevertheless is a very creative and well performed interpretation of a fetid slice of Jewish life.

Burstyn's performance as Sara displays great insight and a keen knowledge of Jewish culture.

Leto, the young actor best known from the TV series My So-Called Life, is not everyone's idea of a Brooklyn Jewish boy, but that is the point. Despite his background, Harry Goldfarb aspires to be Tyrone's Caucasian equivalent. Leto eloquently shows that Harry's virtues and vices are linked in a tragic symbiosis.

The supporting cast also puts in able performances. Wayans' Tyrone is honest and real. David and Gullette recreate two very different urban sexual predators. And Connelly's charting of Marion's descent from playful princess to pathetic prostitute provides us with the most dramatic illustration of addiction's levelling effects.

Oprah picks the Windy City as the place to live in

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

CHICAGO — With only a brief few days in Chicago, we found it difficult to do justice to a city rich in natural beauty that is also a cultural and shopping mecca and home to Oprah.

I was able to cut one thing out of my schedule immediately, as would-be Oprah audience members are required to reserve tickets at least one month in advance. On a Greyhound city bus tour, however, I saw the actual apartment building where the great one lives – on the top two floors, the guide explained – "one for living, one for recreation."

Other highlights of the tour included the Planetarium, the home of the infamous Louis Farrakhan, Wrigley Field, and the scenic drive along Lake Michigan. By taking the tour, I was able to zero in on the things I wanted to revisit on my own later.

The Magnificent Mile, a mile-long avenue in the heart of the city, features every well-known store and designer. The window shopping on "The Mile" is almost like being in a fashion museum, but prices are rather high for the average shopper, especially the average shopper with Canadian dollars!

Jewish life in Chicago is thriving, well organized and apparently representative of every possible interest group. This year marks the 100th anniversary of the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Chicago, which is being highlighted by an exhibit at the Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies, on display until Dec. 31.

There is so much to see and do in the city that a visit to one or two Web sites would be helpful for pre-planning. The Chicago Jewish News is a weekly publication that also puts out an annual Guide to The Whos, Whats and Wheres of Jewish Chicago. Visit its Web site at www.chicagojewishnews.com. Another helpful and informative publication, the monthly JUF News, can be viewed at www.juf.org. It also publishes an annual Guide to Jewish Living in Chicago.

The Spertus Museum, located at 618 South Michigan Avenue in the heart of downtown Chicago, is easily accessible on foot from most of the major hotels. It is close to the Chicago Art Institute, making for an interesting half-day outing.

Literally pages of listings in directories for kosher markets and restaurants

I had the amazing good fortune to arrive at the Spertus at the same moment as Georgette Spertus, widow of the museum's founder, Maurice. She was happy to talk about her late husband's efforts to bring Holocaust artifacts out of Europe and his idea to found a museum to properly house them.

Georgette Spertus, a retired art conservator, pointed out the various exhibits in the museum and urged me to visit the basement where the children's museum is housed.

The main exhibit at the Spertus, until Feb. 11, 2001, is Judging the Book by Its Cover: Torah Coverings from the Philip and Sylvia Spertus Judaica Prize Competition. The exhibition of original Torah coverings showcases the winners and finalists of the international competition for contemporary Jewish ceremonial art. Both first- and second-place winners are Canadians (previously profiled in The CJN).

In conjunction with this exhibit, historic Torah coverings and ornaments from the museum's collection are also on display.

Shopping for Judaica and kosher goodies is a tour in itself. There are literally pages and pages of listings in directories for kosher markets and restaurants. A stroll along Devon Avenue was productive; this street is home to a variety of gift shops, book stores and food shops. Rosenblum's World of Judaica, Inc. at 2906 W. Devon Ave., can be visited without paying the airfare at www.alljudaica.com.

There is so much to see and do in Chicago that one visit only whets the appetite – both figuratively and literally. I'll definitely have to go back for more!

FORMER HEBREW SCHOOL TEACHER IS A PROLIFIC CHILDREN'S AUTHOR

Since leaving her post as a teacher at the Bayview campus of USDS three years ago, Lynne Kositsky has published three children's books (for ages nine to 14) and has three more that she expects to see in print shortly.

Roussan, a publisher in Montreal, published her first three titles. While Candles is a fantasy about Chanukah that is popular at many Jewish schools, Kositsky admits that her second book, Rebecca's Flame, will likely never be widely read in Jewish circles because it tells the story of a young Jewish woman's conversion to Catholicism during Ireland's 19th-century potato famine.

The third book, A Question of Will, explores the question of the authorship of Shakespeare's plays; it contains one peripheral Jewish character. Kositsky has done extensive historical research on the period and has been invited to speak to the Association of Jewish Librarians on Shakespeare and the Jews.

Numerous other speaking engagements across Canada and the United States fill her calendar in the coming year, and she's won numerous provincial and federal grants. She's got two books coming out on the Acadians, and another on Canada's Black loyalists.

She's also "in the midst of writing a very difficult book about the Holocaust," she says. "It's about some Jewish children who lived in a castle in France. It's a very interesting story that hasn't been well publicized. I've been in touch with many of the survivors."

Kositsky says her ideas come to her during her research and that her years of teaching have honed her instincts about what young readers like. "I've had a fabulous response, and that's been very gratifying," she says. "That's what has kept me going."

Geared for the middle reader (ages 12+), A Question of Will is available in bookstores for $7.95.

Sculpture School Unveiled: Several years ago Al Green, the founder of Greenwin Developments, started a second career as a sculptor. Seven of his metal pieces grace the plaza surrounding the Yonge-Eglinton Centre (where Greenwin is headquartered), and numerous others have become part of private collections across North America.

Recently Green established the City Sculpture School and Studio, a non-profit organization geared to assisting people in their senior years who take up sculpting as a creative avocation. He calls it a "one-stop sculpting centre for adults and seniors."

Members receive materials supplied at cost, ample independent studio time, mentoring with established sculptors and a ready-made community of new and experienced sculptors. The renowned sculptors Sorel Etrog, Maryon Kantaroff and Morton Katz sit on the board of advisors.

City Sculpture School and Studio, Greenwin Square Mall, 345 Bloor St. E., Unit 1C. Opening reception, Nov. 30, 6 to 8 p.m., features an exhibition of works by Green, Etrog, Kantaroff, Katz and Lorne Winters. 416-963-9909 or www.citysculpture.net.

NCSY Concert: More than 2,000 people are expected to attend the National Conference of Synagogue Youth's 20th annual concert, at Roy Thomson Hall, Dec. 4, 7:30 p.m. Considered by some to be "Toronto's premier Jewish music event," the concert is based on the theme of achdus (unity) and features Shlomo Simcha, Dovi Dovid and the Eitz Chaim Boy's Choir from Toronto and Shloimie Dachs, Mendy Wald and Yisroel Williger, a hot trio from New York. Backup music is performed by the Nafshenu Orchestra. For tickets, contact Roz English, 905-761-6279, ext. 21, or visit the website at www.ncsy.ca.

Reading at Israel's: Toronto author Erna Paris reads from her latest book, Long Shadow — Truth, Lies and History, a "tenacious and intelligent investigation of the way nations lie to themselves" and how "courageous individuals fight to recover the truth." Israel's Judaica Centre, 897 Eglinton Ave., west of Bathurst. Free admission; refreshments. Sunday, Dec. 3, 8 p.m.

At the Galleries: The Castlefield Six group of artists present a holiday show and sale of paintings, sculpture, ceramics, handcrafted jewelry and glassworks. Women's Art Association Gallery, 23 Prince Arthur Ave., Dec 1, 2 and 3. Sunday hours; noon to 5 p.m.

Israelis get help dealing with psychotrauma

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – For the first time, Israelis have an existential fear of Israel disappearing, according to Danny Brom, director of the Israel Centre for the Treatment of Psychotrauma at Herzog Hospital, Ezrath Nashim, in Jerusalem.

"We always thought that the army would protect us. Now we see that even a powerful army can't cope with what is happening; no army can win a guerilla war."

Brom was on a one-day visit to Toronto as part of a North American trip to make contact with people here dealing with trauma and to help raise funds for the hospital.

Sarah Herzog Hospital is a major centre for geriatric and psychiatric medicine.

Israelis always knew that Americans and Canadians don't come because they feel it isn't safe. Now, he said, within Israel, "people from Tel Aviv don't go to Jerusalem, people in Jerusalem don't go to east Jerusalem, and in places like Gilo, where there is shooting, they say they won't go into the bedroom because it isn't safe."

Psychotrauma, Brom explained, means "adjusting the mental map of what is safe and what is dangerous. People will do anything to remain safe."

In addition to the army not being able to protect Israelis against the uprising, Brom said, there is the shock caused by Israeli Arabs joining it. "We thought that they were a group we could live with."

For the first few days of trouble, he explained, "you are totally focused on what is happening. The brain shuts down to a more simplistic way of functioning. The only thing that is important is if it is safe or dangerous."

After a while, you feel numb. "The shooting goes on – but you get used to it."

Among the results of this uncertainty, said Brom, is that teachers report that children are "docile – sweeter than ever." It is part of the typical Israeli response, he noted, to be strong, to pretend you don't feel.

Teachers say that they don't dare open the topic for fear the children would become violent in the classroom, he said. There is already fighting between kids from left-leaning and right-leaning families, as well as cases of children "doing a lynch," playing at the horrific story of the two soldiers who were lynched in Ramallah.

Older teenagers, knowing they will be going into the army soon, boast that they will go and kill Arabs, a dangerous attitude to start out with, Brom said wryly.

Brom has begun an emergency trauma project, in which he holds workshops to teach teachers how to help youngsters – and themselves – how to cope with these feelings. They learn the distinction between trauma (the normal reaction to stress) and pathological reaction.

Using a process called cognitive behaviour therapy, the participants think about one traumatic event, either one that they experienced or one that they saw on TV, and analyse the feelings, thoughts and behaviours resulting from that event.

"They learn that they are not alone with their reactions," Brom said.

Once they identify those reactions, Brom helps them focus on ways to calm themselves, including making lists of things other people do.

Children, for instance, are encouraged to interview older people, such as Holocaust survivors, and ask what the current situation reminds them of.

"It gives a sense of continuity, that it is not the first time bad things happened to us, and it is OK to be frightened."

Normal behaviour, Brom said, is not violent. What happens, he said, is the feeling develops that the person being attacked "deserved it, that we don't act like that, but if someone else does, it is understandable. My parent will approve if I am violent."

Since the troubles are not over, actual treatment is not possible. "After all, we don't want to completely stop the fear in the middle of the shooting. We want people to be alert."

One of Brom's goals is to "educate mental health professionals in effective, short-term treatment. That's what is missing in the mental health field – trauma is different from what they are used to."

About Nutrition By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My children, ages two and four, drink a lot of apple and grape juice. Should I be limiting this?

A. Yes! I think juice should be very limited in children's diets. Here's why. Most parents give kids juice for its vitamins and to quench their thirst. What they don't realize is they are filling up their little tummies on empty calories.

One cup (the size of a tennis ball) of grape juice contains a whopping 155 calories and 0 mg of vitamin C. The same amount of apple juice contains 117 calories and only 2 mg of vitamin C. Most kids drink far more than one cup per day, filling them up and resulting in their eating less of the healthful food offered to them at meals and snacks.

Try to limit juice to breakfast only. The rest of the day, offer water. When offering juice at breakfast, try to encourage orange juice. While it still has 104 calories per cup, it at least contains about 85 mg of vitamin C – more than 100 percent of your child's daily requirements.

To get vitamins into your kids, offer a variety of fresh fruits and vegetables, cooked and raw.

Q. I love dates and find that they serve as an excellent laxative. I worry, though, that they must be loaded with calories since they are so sweet.

A. Actually they aren't. Three large dates contain about 85 calories, 1 gram of protein and 1 gram of fibre, and only 18 grams of carbohydrate (or one starch serving) – a good choice.

Comedy and politics mix in SLAVS!

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not easy to make a black comedy out of the death of socialism in the Soviet Union, but playwright Tony Kushner has done just that with his play SLAVS!

The frantic set changes carried out by the actors themselves amid ever increasing crescendos is another reason why SLAVS! at the Tarragon Theatre is so successful .

The author of Necessary Angel, which won critical plaudits here, doesn't come up with an alternative to socialism. In fact, he ends it with Lenin's famous line, "What is to be done?"

But along the way he uses his fertile brain to draw parallels with what is happening to our own culture, and ends up stating that human nature and its need for gratification, is why socialism failed.

You don't need to be a political junkie to get laughs along the way.

At the beginning, two grannie babushkas argue about the merits of capitalism and socialism while sweeping snow in front of the Kremlin. The idea that these two workers can express themselves in such intellectual terms is, in itself, ironic.

The world's oldest living bolshevik, Aleksil Antedilluvianovich Prelapsarianov, (he's 95) makes a speech in the Hall of Deputies, sees a vision, and drops dead.

Aleksil opines that love is reactionary, that God is a Menshevik, even worse, a reactionary. "He spoke too long," said one deputy.

The scene ends with the stage being transformed into a museum where the brains of early Russian leaders are kept.

"Lenin's brain is the biggest and heaviest," says the female lesbian guard, talented Kelli Fox, one of four actors who switches genders and ages.

An amorous apparatchik (Ashley Wright) tries to make love to the guard only to learn that she has her heart set on a pediatric oncologist, Brenda Robins, a doctor who is banished to Siberia.

In Siberia, Robins hears from a commissar (Randy Hughson) that the Soviet experiment failed "because of international Jews."

Maria Vacratsis, Brenda Robins and Randy Hughson in SLAVS!

The doctor treats a little girl (Adanya Dunn), a nuclear mutant, who was yellow at birth, along with hundreds of other children, owing to radioactive fallout.

Adanya's mother (Maria Vacratsis) gives the commissar what-for, proudly announcing she is a Lithuanian, not a Russian.

The play, directed by Dennis Garnhum, is part of Tarragon Theatre's mandate to present challenging, international work in addition to Canadian plays. It closes Dec. 17. Tel. 416-531-1827.

Israel & the Jewish World

True friends emerge in times of trouble

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Poland has lent its presidential jet to Foreign Minister Wladyslav Bartoszewski for his upcoming visit to Israel.

The reason for the visit, which was to begin Monday, is the 10th anniversary of the resumption of diplomatic relations between the two counties and for the dedication of an exhibit in the Knesset. Bartoszewski will head a large delegation of government officials and journalists.

In an interview with Ha'aretz, Bartoszewski noted that many people had advised him against coming, given the current tension in the region.

"But I rejected them out of hand," he said. "I told both them and myself that true friends are revealed in times of crisis."

One of the opponents was the Palestinian Authority's ambassador to Warsaw. "I reminded him that in 1947, they, the Arabs, rejected the partition decision," said Bartoszewski. "[I said:] 'You began the war and went out to fight the Jews.'"

Bartoszewski's heroic past may explain his strong sympathy for Jews and for Israel, which he has already visited 10 times. Born in 1922, he was arrested by the Nazis during World War II and spent seven months in Auschwitz. After his release, he was among the founders of Zegota – an organization for aiding Jews during the war – and actively helped the Warsaw Ghetto underground.

After the war, he became a professor, a journalist and an anti-communist activist and as a result, he spent seven years in jail. He was declared a Righteous Gentile by Yad Vashem in 1966 and granted honorary Israeli citizenship in 1991.

When the Communists imposed military rule in the 1980s, he was jailed again; after his release, he fled Poland, returning only once democratic rule had been restored. This is his second term as Poland's foreign minister.

But precisely because of his past, Bartoszewski can speak without apologetics on Holocaust-related issues that are currently troubling Poland's relations with both Israel and the international Jewish community. One of these is the opening of a disco not far from Auschwitz.

"Of course we oppose this, but what can we do?" he said, noting that the government has also received complaints from many Poles who were interned in Auschwitz. "The entrepreneur built the structure legally.

"We thought about buying the building from the entrepreneur, but every week he raises the price," the minister continued.

The second divisive issue is how to return stolen Jewish property to its owners. Bartoszewski says this will be addressed by a recently passed law that deals with the general issue of property stolen by the Nazis – an issue which affects millions of Poles as well.

The first step, he said, has been the restoration of religious property, such as synagogues and cemeteries, to the Jewish community. However, he noted, this creates its own problem: The few thousand Jews left in Poland cannot take care of all these sites.

"We will try to find a solution," he pledged.

Bartoszewski said the purpose of his current visit is to try to contribute to normalization of the two countries' relations. Economic co-operation, he noted, is already extensive: Israelis have invested some $2 billion in Poland. The main fields of interest have been construction and communications.

Poland, said Bartoszewski, would like to expand this to other areas as well. Bartoszewski is also interested in military and intelligence co-operation, and said Poland has many "ideas and plans" in this area.

"I know there is excellent co-operation between our [intelligence] services and your Mossad," he added. "There are exchanges of information in the battle against international terrorism and drug smuggling, and other matters."

International inquiry into intifada begins

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The international committee of inquiry into the current intifadah commenced its work in New York last Sunday, despite Israel's objections.

The United States has been adamant that the committee get down to work immediately.

"From our point of view, the fact-finding committee can fulfil a major role in improving the current atmosphere [in the territories] and we ask that it begin its work the minute its members reach the conclusion that they can begin to operate," said a spokesman for the U.S. National Security Council.

Last week, acting Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami sent a letter to U.S. National Security Adviser Sandy Berger, expressing Jerusalem's objections to the start of the committee's work in "the current atmosphere of ongoing violence." However, the White House rejected his request for a delay. In a meeting between U.S. Secretary of Defense William Cohen and Prime Minister Ehud Barak last week, Israel committed itself to co-operating with the committee.

While the United States recognized that it may be difficult for the committee to carry out its task in view of the continuing fighting in the territories, administration officials insisted that fact-finding team must begin its work as soon as possible.

The committee comprises two former U.S. senators, George Mitchell, its chairman and a veteran of the Northern Ireland peace process, and Republican Warren Rodman. In addition, the committee includes former Turkish president Suleiman Demirel, Norwegian Foreign Minister Thorbojrn Jagland and European Union representative, Javier Solana.

It is still unclear when the committee will be able to begin its fact-finding mission and whether the fact-finding teams will be accompanied by military or police observers. Mitchell expressed hope that the teams will be able to enter the territories as soon as possible.

Former squash champ known as 'a real gentleman'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jack Shusterman, one of Canada's top squash players of the 1950s, '60s and '70s, died recently at age 84.

For three consecutive years ending in 1973, Shusterman was at the top of his game, winning the Canadian Senior Squash Championships. As a younger player, Shusterman vaulted onto the national scene with an unexpected performance at a 1952 North American championship. Dubbed "Jack the giant killer," the unseeded Shusterman defeated then Ontario champ Ernie Howard before losing in the final to a top American player.

The same year, he and a partner took the Canadian Squash Doubles Championship.

Shusterman's strength on the court stemmed from his speed and shotmaking ability, his son, Rob, recalled.

Outstanding ambassador for the sport

"He was good at placing the shot and he could return any ball from any wall. He knew all the tricks."

Jon Pearce met Shusterman in the 1960s when he was just beginning to take up the sport. Recalling Shusterman's generosity of spirit, Pearce said "He took me under his wing. He encouraged players."

For 20 years, the two met weekly for a game at the Toronto Racquet Club. Shusterman "was seriously competitive," Pearce said. "He did not like to lose. At the same time, he was a real gentleman. He encouraged and complemented his opponents."

On the court, "he ran and got everything. He was very energetic and ran every ball down. His backhand was better than his forehand. It took me 15 years before I began to beat him. Of course, I'm 20 years younger than him."

Off the court, Pearce remembered Shusterman as "very generous and kind. He offered a lot of advice, not just about squash, but about life."

Shusterman grew up during the Depression in the Queen and McCaul area of downtown Toronto. His parents were Russian immigrants – his father was a shoemaker – and as a youngster, Shusterman, like other Jewish youths of the era, enjoyed sports. He started with handball at the Brunswick YMHA but switched to squash later in life, Rob said.

One of four children, Shusterman worked hard for small change. "The boys scrubbed floors, they did anything to make some money," his former wife, Shirley, said. When he was 10, a family friend loaned Jack a bicycle that he needed for a job delivering medication for Rothbart Pharmacy at College and Spadina.

Shusterman later studied pharmacy at the University of Toronto and played squash for Hart House. After graduating in 1941 he joined the Air Force and served as a pharmacist during the war.

With the war over, Shusterman opened his own business, Jack's Pharmacy, on Lakeshore Boulevard.

All the while, he continued to play frequently and enter tournaments throughout southern Ontario and northern New York, Shirley said.

In 1986, his squash buddies honoured him with a testimonial dinner at the Cricket Club.

"Squash opened a lot of doors for him," Shirley said. "He rubbed shoulders with all kinds of people. He was a caring, compassionate person. Everywhere he went, he was recognized."

In his early years in competitive squash, Shusterman was not totally accepted in the broader community, Pearce recalled.

In 1950 or 1951, he played for the Canadian Lapham Cup team against the United States. That was unusual because in those days, squash "was a closed shop," Pearce said. "They didn't like Jews in private clubs or for the Lapham Cup."

But Shusterman, along with Jack Leibel, another Hart House alumni, broke through barriers by virtue of their excellence at the game. "They got on the team because they were too good to be ignored," Pearce said.

Jack "was never rancorous or bitter about that... It was people like Jack Shusterman and Jack Leibel who opened the eyes of people at private clubs and perhaps paved the way for Jews to get into these clubs.

"They were outstanding ambassadors for the sport of squash."

Shusterman is survived by his two sons, Rob and Alan.

Israel's under-21 soccer team disbanded amid scandal

By DORON BERGERFREUND and ORI LEWIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel Football Association (IFA) announced last week it was disbanding its under-21 team following allegations of a sex scandal involving some of the players.

A report in Ma'ariv claimed several players were involved in an orgy with an 18-year-old woman at the team's hotel at Kfar Hamaccabiah the night before a game against Bosnia on Oct. 10. Israel won the game 2-1.

Players from Hapoel Tel Aviv, Maccabi Tel Aviv and Maccabi Netanya were involved in the incident, according to reports circulating on Internet sites.

Investigators reportedly tracked down the woman in question, and she verified the information. She claimed she was being harassed with incessant phone calls from players and their friends to pressure her to keep quiet.

The players involved are leading members of the squad and IFA sources said Israel may resort to playing the rest of the European under-21 championship qualifying competition with its under-18 team.

The affair surfaced exactly a year after another sex scandal in which members of the national team were alleged to have invited call girls to their Tel Aviv hotel rooms prior to Israel's 5-0 home demolition by Denmark in a Euro 2000 qualifying playoff.

IFA's prosecuting attorney, Shalom Even-Ezra, said he will ask the body's disciplinary court to ban players involved in the orgy from participating in national team games for five years and from playing for their clubs for six months. Late in the week, however, IFA toned down its rhetoric. IFA sources said that even without a confession, Even-Ezra would ask for a relatively light sentence.

A committee set up following last year's sex scandal laid down an ethics code and strict disciplinary guidelines for soccer players representing Israel. The code states emphatically that no guests of any nature are to be invited to team rooms. (None of the players suspected in the original call girl scandal last year faced sanctions as the suspicions were not sufficiently proved.)

A second response to the scandal was in the choice of hotel for athletes. During its training camp, the national team was lodged in a hotel situated well away from major urban centres, to make the players less accessible to the public. The under-21 team did not adopt that policy.

IFA is greatly dismayed at the players' behaviour but those found responsible may not be the only ones to pay for their actions.

Team administrative manager Eli Rosen may also have to either resign or be dismissed for not having made sure that the players were tucked safely in their beds, alone.

"ילדה כמוני" מאת: אורי אורבך

"ילדה כמוני" הוא ספר שלישי בסדרה: "ילד דתי". שני הספרים הראשונים, פרי עטו של אורי אורבך; "אולי בשבת יזרקו סוכריות" ו"בגלל ילד אחד" התקבלו באהדה רבה.

כשאחי אומר שגמרא
"זה לא בשביל בנות",
לאמא ולי
כבר יש תשובות מוכנות.

רגישות רבה יש באורבך לעלבון הפמניסטי. בשם הילדה מעלה אורבך טענות מספר בנושא אי-השוויון.

בבת-המצווה של אחותי
עשינו אֶרוּב מאוד משפחתי,
את בר-המצווה של אחי
נעשה באולם הכי-הכי.

בפי הילד, במקרה שלנו, ילדה אפשר לבטא, בשיא התמימות, אך בנחישות נושאים וערכים שחברת המבוגרים נכשלת בהם;

התפלות של הספרדים,
התפלות של האשכנזים,
התפלות של כל היהודים
עלות לשמים כמו מלאכים
ופתיצבת שם יחד
עם שאר הַנְעָרִים.
והי מקבל כל תפלה מיד
ולא שואל:
"איפה אבא שלך נולד?"

יותר מכל אני אוהבת את הדרך שבה אורבך מעניק לילדים בחברה החילונית אפשרות לעשות הכרות מחנכת עם התרבות היהודית. הילדה היא ילדה שעולמה דתי אך היא ילדה ככל הילדות;

אוהבת את צום גדליה
ואת עשרה בטבת גם,
כי נומרים ללמוד
שעה יותר מקדם.

דינה מדגיפרופטרובסק
הצטרפה לגימ"ל שתיים,
עכשיו כל הכתה
שוברת את השניים.

חיי היום-יום והמנהג הדתי משולבים זה בזה בטבעיות ובחן;

את עמודי הסטרוט והכלכלה
אנחנו שומרים
בשביל הנר של ההבדלה.

תוכן חינוכי, קידום הסובלנות, כתיבה יפה וצחוק בריא. מה עוד חסר? מאומה. יופי של ספרות עברית לילדים.

ZUCCHINI PARMESAN LATKES

2 lb. zucchini
1/2 lb. peeled russet potatoes
1/2 tblsp lemon juice
1 cup chopped scallions
1/2 cup grated Parmesan cheese
1 tsp chopped garlic
3/4 cup chopped parsley (Italian is best)
1 tsp salt
1/2 tsp pepper
2 tsp sugar
1/3 cup flour
2 med. eggs
oil for frying

Grate zucchini & potatoes and toss with lemon juice. Squeeze zucchini & potatoes through sieve.

Add scallions, cheese, garlic, 1/2 cup parsley, salt & pepper, sugar, flour and eggs. Mix well.

Heat oil in pan until hot and add thin silver dollar-size pancakes, frying over high heat until golden brown and crispy.

Before serving sprinkle with remaining chopped parsley.

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

I can't believe that December is just around the corner! Although it seems early to talk about Chanukah, let's get a head start! A little advance planning and preparation will keep you from feeling over whelmed at the last minute.

Some of you prefer to prepare dishes that have been handed down through the generations, while others enjoy new menus each year.

Although potato latkes are traditional, why not experiment with other vegetables like zucchini, sweet potatoes, carrots and spinach? Instead of frying, bake latkes for a lower-fat version.

Here are some simple secrets for luscious latkes. Use Idaho (russet) potatoes because they are higher in starch. The processor will grate them quickly. Immediately add grated onions – the onion juice forms a barrier against the oxygen which makes potatoes turn black.

Latkes can be made in advance and frozen. Arrange latkes in a single layer on a baking sheet. When frozen, wrap them well. To save space when freezing or reheating latkes, stand them upright in a loaf pan.

Reheat them uncovered at 375 for about 10 minutes.

Let's Eat (Sheilah's Easy Ways to Elegant Kosher Cooking) by cooking teacher Sheilah Kaufman is a terrific little cookbook, with 75 of her favourite recipes that she uses repeatedly for easy entertaining or for everyday.

Her recipes can be made in advance or frozen and require little clean-up. Sheilah believes that besides being easy and elegant, cooking has to be "fearless and fussless."

For ordering information, call 301-299-5282, or write to Gourmet Series, 10508 Tyler Trail, Potomac, Md. 20854, or e-mail BAKSRK@aol.com.

Sheilah's roast brisket is quick, easy, tastes wonderful, and freezes well. What more can you want in a main course? It's perfect with latkes for your Chanukah meal. Enjoy!

BEST BRISKET

4 lb. brisket
1 can cranberry sauce
1 packet onion soup mix
1/4 to 1/2 cup water
freshly ground pepper

Preheat oven to 350. Place the brisket in a large pan with a tight fitting lid. Mash cranberry sauce all over the top of the brisket. Sprinkle with powdered onion soup. Season with pepper. Pour water underneath and around brisket. Cover tightly and bake at 350 for about 3 or 4 hours, or until brisket is tender. Cool and slice. Freeze with gravy or separately. Wonderful when served over or with noodles. Serves 6.

THE BUZZ ABOUT SHABBAT

JOSEPH LIEBERMAN GOT THE NATION BUZZING ABOUT AN ANCIENT RITUAL. WHAT DOES IT ALL MEAN? WE ASKED PEOPLE LIKE DEEPAK CHOPRA, ARIANNA HUFFINGTON, LARRY KING, SHIMON PERES, SHMULEY BOTEACH, JUDITH REGAN, MANIS FRIEDMAN AND MANY OTHERS, AND GOT MORE THAN WE BARGAINED FOR.

THANKSGIVING: THE AMERICAN SABBATH

I used to think that love meant knowing how to give.

I've learned that, more than anything, true love means knowing how to take.

When we listen to someone, we're taking. When we ask advice, when we show interest, when we open ourselves to otherness, we're giving by taking.

The philosopher Abraham Joshua Heschel once said that the greatest human need is to become a need. In the garden of Eden, Adam had a million angels to talk to, yet he was supremely lonely. Why? Because the angels didn't need him. They were perfect.

By the act of taking, we give the greatest gift: we make others feel needed. You don't truly love someone until you can take what they need to give you.

The irony is that it is often harder to take than to give. When we give, we're strong and in control, we don't owe a thing. But when we take, we're dependent, naked, face to face with the knowledge that we're incomplete.

If taking is the dance, saying thank you is the contract. It notarizes our fragility. It's the exclamation point that confesses: I need you.

Thanksgiving Day is our collective contract to say thank you, I need you. Whether it's to our family, our friends, our religion or our country, it is our nation's moment when we all collect our blessings.

In a similar vein, humility and gratitude are the kissing cousins of the Jewish Sabbath. Once a week, we thank our Creator and admit that we are incomplete. Far from being painful, this is a reaffirmation of our humanity.

Our sages say that the essence of Shabbat should be present every day of the week. Humility and gratitude on a Tuesday afternoon? Could it be that the whole purpose of Shabbat and Thanksgiving is to remind us that it is always Shabbat and Thanksgiving? Can you imagine if there was a special day of the year not to be thankful?

Try this experiment: this Thanksgiving or Shabbat, or any day for that matter, when you see your grandparent, mother, father, spouse, child, best friend or whomever, stop giving and try taking. Take their advice, their recipes, their pain, their wisdom, their stories, their help – take whatever they want to give you. Then see the joy on their faces and you'll understand true love.

This, then, is what Shabbat means to me: the realization that needing others is not a sign of weakness, but a cause for immense gratitude.

What does Shabbat mean to others? For this special issue of OLAM, we asked an eclectic mix of people to comment on this ancient ritual which has suddenly hit our radar screen. Their responses range from the ethereal to the personal, the comical to the mystical, the historical to the fictional. As you'll see, nobody held back.

Now go ahead and take from us. We need it.

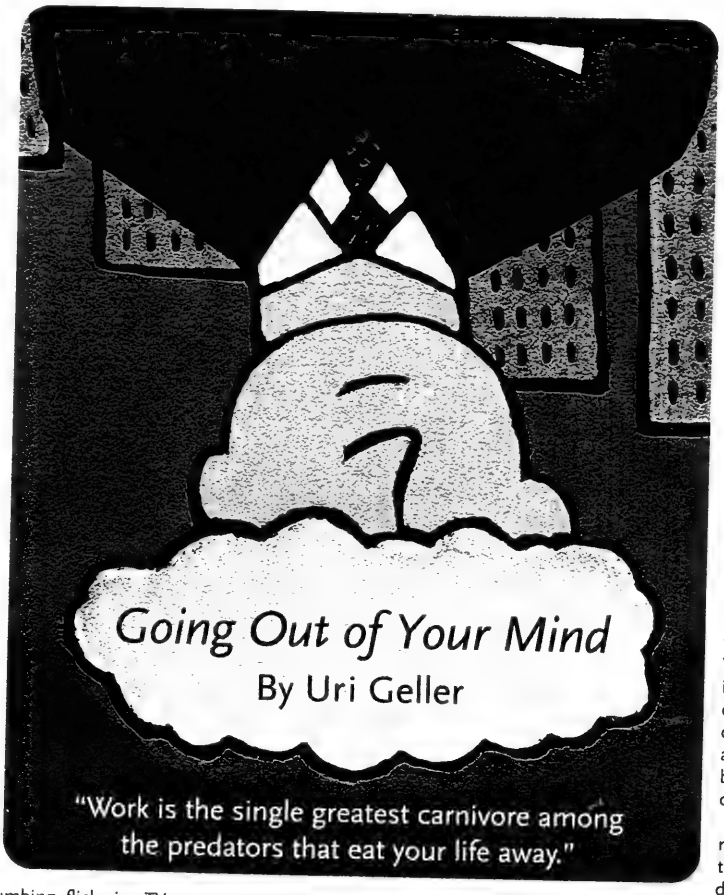
You work too hard. Your mind needs a rest. I don't have to meet you to know this. I simply have to look at the statistics. They are brutal.

Going Out of Your Mind

By Uri Geller



"Work is the single greatest carnivore among the predators that eat your life away."

For an "average American" who leaves college at 22 and lives to be 70, the 48-year adult lifespan can be broken down into a few key activities. Work will consume a total of 16 years – that's 16 years nonstop, without any breaks for eating, sleeping or vacationing.

Work is the single greatest carnivore among the predators that eat your life away. Whether it's a life labored away in meetings and sales presentations, or consumed by study at a desk, talked out on the telephone or spent in the sheer physical exertion of caring for other people, you spend more time working than doing anything else.

Sleep is the next greatest factor – sleep, and time spent lying awake in bed, wishing you could either get to sleep or summon the energy to get up. The average is 15 years – a shade under eight hours a day.

For many people whose work is particularly demanding (and that almost certainly includes the majority of OLAM readers) those 15 years will be whittled down by early starts and thousands of hours lost burning the midnight oil.

The next biggest drain on your time is a shocker – it's television. You could spend up to eight years watching soaps and talkshows, movies and news bulletins. TV occupies more than twice as much time as eating – if you don't eat while staring at a mind-numbing, flickering TV or computer screen.

Commuting is another heavy burden: The average American spends two entire years travelling between home and work. Chances are that more work is done during that time, if public transport is used...and more mindless entertainment is consumed, in the form of banal radio chat and mass-produced music, when the commuting is done by car.

What about the other stuff? The good stuff? Games with children and grandchildren, outings and theater trips, an afternoon ball game with good friends, love-making?

The stark fact is that less than four years are devoted to these essential luxuries. That's one-twelfth of your adult life, a maximum of five minutes in every hour. Tragically, most of that time will be postponed to the period called retirement, when many people no longer enjoy the health needed to live life to the fullest.

My purpose in spelling this out is not to depress you. I want to inspire you. I want to wake you up. I want you to reclaim your life. Remember, don't take immediate action. Quite the opposite – I am ordering you to take an immediate rest.

Give your mind a few moments of blissful relaxation. Block the constant barrage of over-stimulation and stem the rivers of useless information, by simply pointing your mind in another direction.

Look at the sky and study the clouds. Let your mind float up among them. If you can't see the sky right now, even better...imagine the clouds. Relax.

This cannot be done with the television blaring. Ask yourself if you would like to reclaim some of those eight wasted years, before they're gone forever. Then press the 'off' switch.

Is that so hard? Are you really missing anything? Will your life be less rich or varied if you stop subjecting yourself to the countless hours of television and media propaganda supported by intervals of poorly written, badly-acted shows?

Reverse the question – do you expect that on your deathbed, you'll say, "I wish I'd spent more time watching TV?"

Treat these reclaimed hours as mind time. Enjoy the sensation of freedom from artificial stimulation. You'll taste the difference instantly. As though a can of hyped-up, sugared-up, caffeine-spiked, additive-addled cola suddenly becomes a glass of water, chilled and cleansing.

Rest your mind. Do nothing with it. When thoughts drift in, let them drift out again. Think of things you do without thinking – the rhythm of your breathing, the scent of air. Listen to your heartbeat.

I am not telling you to pick up the Torah and meditate on a verse, or start praying. The desire for these wonderful mental pleasures will develop naturally, as your mind learns to rest. For now, think of nothing in particular. Or, nothing at all.

The rush of outside stimulation will start up soon enough. Don't worry about how many moments of mind time you can cram in before the rest of the world intrudes. Let it come when it will. Until then, rest.

The vagrant poet WH Davies, whose life's work was to gaze into the sky and watch the clouds, once asked, "What is this life if, full of care, we have no time to stand and stare?"

A Time for the Timeless

by Deepak Chopra

"By observing Shabbat, the faithful are going inward to meet that silence which is the womb of creation."

As a day of rest, the Sabbath is not a mystery, yet it leads the way to mystery, and that is its fascination. On the seventh day the Lord rested from the labor of creation. This duty was passed on to His human children, and Shabbat became a devoted way to live according to God's plan. Yet behind this simple reason something deeper is at work. Shabbat belongs to a profound strain of wisdom that reveres the feminine face of God, whose silent, nurturing, receptive aspects are not easily available in our active, outward-turned lives. By observing Shabbat, the faithful are going inward to meet that silence which is the womb of creation.

Shabbat is about the source. On the seventh day God did not merely rest – He returned to his uncreated nature, that place which is before time and outside space. This domain is inconceivable, for how can anything be before time? Where is the place outside space when 'where' has no meaning? All wisdom traditions, including the Judaic, have pondered this mystery, and they came up with an amazing answer: The transcendent God, if He is beyond anything we can measure, must be everywhere at all times while being nowhere at any time. Is this just a paradox? No, for on Shabbat, the devout are asked to join God in this silent, transcendent place. This is the time to greet the timeless.

How do they accomplish this? Prayers and rituals can point the way, but it is up to the devotee to make the journey. Of course it cannot be done. To get from this finite, bounded world to God's infinite unbounded domain requires a step that the mind is helpless to achieve. God must offer a way. Therefore patience is required to find it, along with waiting, calmness, observation. Beyond resting, Shabbat is a time to be alert to whatever clue God wants to send your way. For some, the clue is a sense of peace, safety or being loved, or of being in direct connection to the Divine. What these all have in common is traditionally called God's presence – a mysterious indicator that God is here, even though on the surface He leaves not the slightest footprint in the visible world. Shabbat is a time, then, to stop believing your senses and to see with the eyes of the soul.

In Sanskrit, the word for this presence is Shakti, in Hebrew it is Shekinah. Being devoid of human images for God, Judaic belief does not turn Shakti into a wife for the male god, a dancing seductress with an irresistible smile. Rather, Shekinah is pure light, a divine energy that can penetrate this solid, sleeping world to wake up those souls who are willing to feel its presence. But what the ancient texts tell us of Shakti tempts me to say that she is Shekinah as well. Shakti is that impulse of God that wants to touch the heart of the devout, to cause transformation, to render the human more than human. This happens in five ways, and to me they are the five aspects of Shabbat that are truly a part of the 'one light':

1. Silence. This is not an empty silence but a sounding chamber for whatever God will fill in. Silence is expectant, and with prayer and attention, the expectation bears fruit as a sense of being with God.

2. Bliss. This is happiness for no reason, happiness that cannot be taken away. By the name of ecstasy it pertains to a sense of being beyond hope or despair, standing beyond your mortal coil. Bliss grows from silence, naturally.

3. The fulfillment of prayer. In the deepest silence the deepest prayers are answered. We discover that God's presence is not static but gives organizing power to our desires, hopes and aspirations.

4. Knowingness or intuition. God's presence gives us a direct way of knowing that that is the source of wisdom. This knowing is not a matter of rationality; answers come to us from beyond our limited personalities, as if from the source.

5. Inspired action, the holy life. When all these gifts of the Shekinah are received, then it is possible to live the holy life in full measure, because our actions are spontaneously right and good and in accord with divine intention.

I have not been giving a mystical picture of Shabbat but rather a path. Every year the calendar shows the same holy days, but in life they deepen with the passage of time. God's light or presence becomes fuller and fuller. The eyes of the soul become our natural way of seeing. In the ripening of each season, we discover that a spark of light that once glimmered very faintly inside the heart has now spread everywhere, as it must if it is divine. Shabbat is fulfilled when the devout can walk down any street at any hour and see holiness in the face of a stranger or in the hard glint of stone. God will have dropped His mask, revealing the secret of being at once everywhere and nowhere.

"More than Israel kept the Sabbath, the Sabbath kept them."

These words, written nearly a century ago by the great Zionist thinker Ahad Ha'am, an erudite scholar well versed in the history and heritage of his people, speak volumes to a man whose first encounter with this magical day came as a Refusenik. To be sure, Shabbat for me did not have the same significance as it might for one schooled in its laws and familiar with its beauty. Those who struggled to free Soviet Jewry were largely ignorant of the demands of a faith they were forbidden to practice. But Saturday was still a special day for us – the day we flocked towards central Moscow to congregate on Archipov Street, opposite the "Official Soviet Synagogue" the regime kept as a reminder of a bygone era.

But rather than joining one another in prayer or contemplating the contemporary meaning of the weekly Torah portion, we used this precious time together to share information with our fellow activists and coordinate our plans for the days ahead – all under the watchful eyes of the KGB. But while such a Shabbat may seem a far cry from the one observed by our brothers on the other side of the Iron Curtain, the perspective of someone who has now experienced both has convinced me that the day I celebrated back then was not entirely different from the one my people consecrated elsewhere.

"SATURDAY WAS THE DAY WE FLOCKED TOWARDS CENTRAL MOSCOW TO CONGREGATE ON ARCHIPOV STREET, OPPOSITE THE 'OFFICIAL SOVIET SYNAGOGUE' THE REGIME KEPT AS A REMINDER OF A BYGONE ERA."

Indeed, Shabbat is a time for man to acknowledge his Creator. But it is also a time for the individual Jew to reconnect to his family and to his nation. On those Saturdays in Moscow, not only did I strengthen my relationship with fellow activists devoted to a common cause, I deepened my connection to my people. Those Shabbatot were a porthole that transported me from the emptiness of a rootless communist state to a world rich in identity and tradition. It was there that we met our fellow Jews from abroad, that we spoke of our faith and where we exchanged the illegal books that taught us of a past that the State had tried to confiscate long ago.

As for family, it was outside that very synagogue, on the Saturday after the Yom Kippur War broke out, where I met a beautiful young woman searching for answers as to why her brother Michael, a new activist I had recruited the week before, had been sentenced by the authorities to fifteen days in prison. I do not recall whether my explanations satisfied her, but I knew right away that I had found my soulmate.

Thirteen years later, I spent my first Shabbat in Israel. That same brother-in-law, now a captain in the Israeli army, came to our rented apartment in Jerusalem to take me for a drive around my new country. While I was still entirely ignorant of Jewish ritual, Avital, now my wife, had become observant during our long separation, and I could see how important she considered the sanctity of Shabbat. Having not parted company with her since my arrival, I decided not to leave on a day that meant so much to her. It is a decision I have never regretted, and one that restored to my family a Shabbat observance that decades of communist rule had sought to destroy.

Today, a Shabbat I never knew has become an emotional and spiritual oasis. From reciting the Kiddush on Friday night to reading the weekly sidra, each Shabbat is an opportunity to reconnect to my family, faith and people. Blessing my children as my grandfather once blessed me, fuses past, present and future. The time I have set out during its afternoons to study the works of Maimonides, Rav Solovetchik and Rav Kook has made the wisdom of our sages a part of my living heritage, enriching my life beyond measure.

In the years since I arrived in Israel, I have broken the Sabbath only once. But to consider breaking the sanctity of a day that had always brought me closer to my people, I would have to be brought even closer. Joining Operation Solomon, I flew to Addis Ababa and helped an ancient Jewish community return to its homeland. In watching men, women and children who had trekked for countless days and nights across hot desert sands calmly board a plane that would take them to a promised land they had never seen, history came alive and the Sabbath was truly sanctified.

Having experienced the warm and beautiful embrace of Shabbat, I can only offer my sympathies to those who do not realize how wonderful life can be when it is liberated from the sound and fury of our everyday world. With the volume on the outside world turned down, Shabbat allows us to once again hear our inner voice. The Shabbat our people have kept for thousands of years, continues to watch over me. No doubt Israel's watchman will guard every Jew that seeks her protection.

THE CURE FOR DESPAIR

BY HAROLD KUSHNER

I have always been fond of the Jewish teaching that, when God created the world, He left it a little bit unfinished, so that we could become God's partners in the creative process by finishing it. The Sages tell us that "God could have made a world in which bread grew out of the ground. Instead He made wheat grow, so that people might turn it into bread." God could have filled the world with houses, as He provides homes for animals. Instead He filled the earth with trees and stones, with which we can build homes.

That insight helps me understand the residue of chaos in the world – diseases, crime, hunger and the like. God doesn't want those things to happen. God is waiting for us to figure out how to eliminate them, to carry out His plan for the world.

There is just one problem with being God's partner in finishing what was left undone. It is an exhausting, never-ending process. Habitat for Humanity will build one hundred homes to ease the plight of the homeless, but in the time it takes them to do that, another fifty families will have become homeless. A church or synagogue will set up a soup kitchen to feed the hungry, but even as they do so, additional workers will lose their jobs and need a free meal. It is hard not to despair when we contemplate how much of God's world still needs to be fixed.

The cure for that sense of despair is the Sabbath. Six days a week, we wrestle with the world, acutely aware of everything that is wrong with it, laboring to fix it all, to heal the sick, to find work for the idled, to punish criminals, to build better computers, to write better books and symphonies. On the seventh day, we rest, even as God rested on that first Sabbath. It is a day for leaving well enough alone, declaring a truce in our battle with all of the world's imperfections. It is a day on which we look at the world and see it not as it is but as it might be, as it should be, as it one day will be. Even as a builder needs a set of blueprints to tell him what the final product will look like, we need to hold aloft a vision of what the world could and should be, both to give us a sense of what must be done and to inspire us with a vision of what our reward will be when we have completed the work.

> "He made wheat grow, so that people might turn it into bread."

The 92nd Psalm in the Book of Psalms is one of the Bible's classic answers to the riddle of why the righteous suffer and the wicked prosper. The psalmist's answer is that both the suffering of good people and the prosperity of bad people is temporary. In time, God's justice will catch up with all of them. The psalm is titled "a Song for the Sabbath day." What is the connection between the Sabbath and God's ultimate justice? During the week, we let the unfairness of the world upset us, to motivate us to do something about it. But on the Sabbath, we overlook the world's unfairness, not to deny it but to remind ourselves of what the world will look like when wickedness and unfairness are finally banished. We need that reminder on the Sabbath to empower us to go back to the sacred work of mending what is broken in God's world on Sunday morning.

When people would ask their teachers, "What will life be like in the World to Come?" their teachers would answer, "Keep the Sabbath as a day free from labor, free from struggle, free from care and anxiety. Live it as a day in which the world has achieved perfection and you will have a foretaste of the World to Come, the day when God's world will be made complete."

My New New Thing:
Single Tasking
by Arianna Huffington
OLAM

My mother, the central force in my life, died last month. The last time she was upset with me was when she saw me talking with my children and opening my mail at the same time. She despised multi-tasking. She believed it was a way to miss life, to miss the gifts that come only when you give 100% of yourself to a task, a relationship, a moment.

In the weeks since her death, I've realized that she and I had an unspoken deal: hers would be the rhythm of a timeless world, a child's rhythm; mine was the rhythm of the modern world. While I had the sense every time I looked at my watch that it was later than I thought, she lived in a world where there were no impersonal encounters, where a trip to the farmer's market happily filled half a day, where there was always

> "The last time my mother was upset with me was when she saw me talking with my children and opening my mail at the same time."

enough time for wonder at how lovely the rosemary looked next to the lavender. In fact, going through the market with her was like walking through the Louvre with an art connoisseur – except that you could touch and smell these still lifes.

She left no will and no prized possessions – which is not surprising, considering her habit of giving such things away. For instance, there was the time we tried to give her a second watch, and within 48 hours she had given it to someone else. So what she's left us with is the treasure house of her spirit. It's as though certain gifts can only be bequeathed at one's death: that while she was alive she so embodied the qualities of nurturing, simplicity, unconditional loving and a connection with the sacred that it felt as if those dimensions of life were taken care of for all those blessed to be in her orbit. Why learn how to cook when you live with The Iron Chef?

And now that she's gone, I know that however difficult, inconvenient, even unnatural it may be for a while, there is only one way to honor her by living differently, living more like she lived, bridging the world of the urgent with the world of miracles and wonder. The first world, the world we inhabit most of the time, is governed by our appetites: the next promotion, the next conquest, the next hot meal. The other is the universe where fishes and loaves can multiply and we can love our neighbor as ourselves.

Yet we have been sacrificing the important on the altar of the urgent for so long that our lives have lost their balance and we have lost our center. And, of course, we have massively redefined the urgent. It's no longer just dealing with a blazing fire, it's rather worrying about the probability of a fire starting and especially about the possibility of missing some fireworks. Some of my most beloved friends feel alive only when they are living life on the brink, dealing with half a dozen crises, wallowing in the drama of it all, and having to drug themselves before they can go back to sleep when they wake up in the middle of the night.

> "Going through the market with her was like walking through the Louvre with an art connoisseur, except that you could touch and smell these still lifes."

To move the important to the center of our existence and tend to our souls – which for me is the meaning of Shabbat – we need to bring timelessness into our lives. It also means, as my mother would urge, putting an end to multi-tasking – the weapon that helps us gain the heights, but is the enemy of the depths. And it is only when we tap into the depths that we redeem from them the spirit, the imagination and the intuitive abilities that have been crushed under the pressures of modern life, where clock and compass are used to calculate the span of our every action, desire and thought.

What modern man calls intuition, the ancients often understood as spiritual guidance from another realm – divine tidings, prophetic warnings. But our modern lives are, more often than not, case studies not of the whispered voice followed but of the whispered voice ignored or denied – often at our peril.

When the practice of Shabbat becomes not simply a day off but a new way of life, we are freed from the tyranny of the urgent. And then we can allow gratitude to enter our lives. Gratitude has always been for me one of the most powerful emotions. But it is very hard to manifest in a life that is a race with time.

My mother used to say that the goal of life is not to see what we can make of it, but what it can make of us. And for that we don't have to go east or west, to India or Walden Pond, but we do have to – and not just now and then – pull out of the fast lane.

> "When the practice of Shabbat becomes not simply a day off but a new way of life, we are freed from the tyranny of the urgent."

MOST WANTED MAN on Earth

Soul Fiction by Mike Indgin

THE SUNGLASSES ON THE MAN IN THE BLACK SUIT matched the dark tinting of the van he had just exited. He looked to the sky and was reassured at the presence of the helicopter hovering above him. He tapped his sunglasses twice and ducked into a doorway.

Agent Kinney was surprised to find the young man waiting right where he said he would be: at the counter of the rundown deli, spooning kreplach from a large bowl.

Apprehending one of the FBI's Most Wanted had never been this easy. It made Agent Kinney nervous.

"Don't worry," said Melmann. "I've got nothing up my sleeve or under my yarmulke."

The agent slipped onto the stool next to Melmann and sized up his captive the way they had taught him in Quantico. He couldn't help chuckling to himself as he removed his sunglasses. So this was the mastermind responsible for bringing the entire world to a screeching halt. Woody Allen could beat this guy in a wrestling match.

"I recommend everything but the matzo brie," said Melmann as he called the waitress over.

"Just coffee, black please." Agent Kinney didn't know what matzo brie was, and he wasn't about to show any sign of weakness.

Melmann sighed. So his last day of freedom would end here, in a Newark deli with an over-caffeinated Joe Friday.

Agent Kinney got right down to business. "Ira Melmann, I'm Federal Agent Kinney. You're under arrest for a number of charges too lengthy to mention."

Melmann knew he was going away for a long time. He also knew prison was a very dangerous place for a guy with less than 6% body fat. He postponed the inevitable by changing the subject. "So would you like to know why I did it?"

"There are a few folks back at the ranch who are a bit interested, yes." Kinney leaned into his subject so the miniature camera in his lapel could better capture the confession. "What was the plan? Bank heist? Blackmail? Insider trading?"

Melmann stirred his soup and smiled.

"Actually, I just wanted to give us all a rest. And I thought 25 hours without internet access would be a great start. So I hacked my way in and unplugged the World Wide Web for a day. And then to my delight, it caused a domino effect that shut down everything else."

This was new information to Agent Kinney. "So you didn't know you'd be causing a worldwide blackout...?"

"Not at all. Who knew computers had become that powerful?"

Agent Kinney shrugged, hoping the mainframe that was taping them via satellite wouldn't pick up the fact that he was blushing.

"But why did you do it again the following Saturday?"

"One day of rest deserved another. Didn't you notice the calming effect it had all around you?"

Agent Kinney frowned. "Actually there was mass panic and looting all over the globe."

Melmann coughed. "Right. But the next Friday night, things settled down. By the third week, we all got into a groove: No work to do. No phones to answer. No planes to catch. No place any of us had to be, except at home with our families."

Agent Kinney nodded. This was in fact what had happened at his house. With no phone or pager to reach him, he had actually spent the preceding Saturday watching his son learn to crawl.

"HE ALSO KNEW PRISON WAS A VERY DANGEROUS PLACE FOR A GUY WITH LESS THAN 6% BODY FAT."

Melmann turned to his captor. "You have to admit it's been kind of nice. A little less rat race – who knows, maybe a time-out once a week is all it would take to save the planet."

"Maybe," replied Agent Kinney. He knew he was being monitored and didn't want to sound like he was consorting with the enemy. He stood up and produced a pair of handcuffs. Before he could place them on Melmann's outstretched wrists, his earplug rang.

"Kinney here." He stood at attention as he listened at length to the voice on the other end. "Yes, Mr. President. Right away, sir. No, thank you, sir."

Agent Kinney put the handcuffs back in his jacket pocket. "Seems your little scheme is actually having a positive effect. Something about lowered fuel costs and improved economy. You're no longer under arrest and you're invited to the White House for dinner. Are you free this Friday night?"

Melmann smiled and shook his head. "Sorry. I've got a previous commitment."

Don't forget to light, Issur

by Kirk Douglas

My mother was a wonderful woman who gave me my best qualities. It took me a long time to become conscious of that. But my heart knew it always. The knowledge was expressed in little subconscious ways. For example, when I formed my independent production company back in the early 1950's, I named it for my mother Bryna.

My mother never learned English. But I remember fondly how on the Sabbath she would make our whirlwind of a family stand still for a moment as she sat on the porch reading aloud from her Hebrew prayer book. When the Bryna production company became well known following several critical hits, I took my mother to Times Square in a big limo and pointed out a sign that covered the whole building. "You see, Ma, in lights, BRYNA PRESENTS". My mother simply shook her head and sighed, "America, such a wonderful land."

I agreed with my mother.

It is no coincidence that when I formed the Bryna Company, I also started a charitable foundation. I should have named that after my mother as well, because it was clearly her influence that was playing out in me. I remember that in our home we had a little tin box, a pushke, nailed to the wall.

Pushke in Yiddish means tin can, but this one was more like a piggy bank. It was where we placed coins to be given to charity. Of course, we barely had enough to eat ourselves, so our pushke was never bulging. But my mother made sure that there was always something in it. The Torah commands us to give to the poor. Charity is called tzedaka, because there is always someone who has less. A lot of people in the neighborhood thought my mother was a tzaddikes, a saint. They would bring her a handkerchief to bless and then place it on the head of some sick person, convinced that her blessing would make the sick well. Maybe it did.

During my freshman year in college, I became ill with the flu, and was lying in my dormitory room with a high fever. There was a knock on the door. "Your mother's on the phone." I was startled – we didn't have a telephone at home. She never called. I threw on a robe and walked down the hall.

My mother was calling me from a neighbor's home. "I had a feeling you were sick," she said. I went back to my bed perplexed. How could she have known?

I never gave her credit for so many things she did and was responsible for. Only now I realize the profound influence she had on me.

Most of all, I remember vividly how she died. She had been in the hospital for some time, unable to fight off pneumonia because of her weak heart and complications from her diabetes. My sisters and I stayed at her side as she got weaker and weaker, drifting in and out of consciousness. At dusk one day she roused herself. "What day is it?"

"The nurses came in screaming. With the oxygen in the room, we could have blown up the hospital."

"Friday, Mama."

"Don't forget to light the candles on the Sabbath."

We quickly brought four candles to the room and started to light them. The nurses came in screaming. With the oxygen in the room, we could have blown up the hospital. So we went to my sister Betty's house to light them there.

Afterward, I came back alone. I was overwhelmed by my mother's composure and dignity. My father had died some years before, and the look in his dying eyes was unmistakable – sheer terror.

Watching my mother in that hospital bed, I must have seemed pretty scared myself, because she looked up at me and smiled a clear, serene smile. It was the kind of smile she used to have on her face every Sabbath when she sat on the porch with her prayer book. "Don't be afraid, Issur. It happens to all of us," she said.

I choked. Holding my own breath, I watched my mother breathe in, then out, so slowly, each breath causing her pain, until a long, deflating exhale followed by...nothing.

That is how the tzaddikim die, I have been told. It is called "dying by the kiss of G–d." The same G–d who created man by breathing life into him now kisses him and takes that breath away. It is a sign from G–d that someone is very special. Moses died that way, the Bible says.

I think a lot about how my mother died. I have not been a tzaddik; I cannot expect to die in this special way. But I do not want to go terrified into the darkness.

SHABBOS GEMS FROM SHLOMO CARLEBACH
compiled by Michael Ozair
"You can keep every Shabbos to the letter of the law, but unless Shabbos reaches the deepest place in your heart, you haven't kept Shabbos."
"'G-d created the world in six days and on Shabbos He rested.' What a sad translation! On Shabbos, G-d gave the world a soul."
"Shabbos is the strongest vitamin because its nutrients are those which can heal the soul."
"Happy are those who walk the streets of the world with the fragrance of Shabbos."
"A Shabbos test. If you want to know how much you like a person, see if you can sit with them ...without doing anything."
"When G-d drove Adam from Paradise, he retained part of his soul to remain there. On Shabbos, G-d releases that part and gives it back to man."
"Shabbos invites all those who are tired of walking slowly, who only cover a spiritual inch per lifetime on their journeys."
"Friday night, when my heart is overflowing like the Kiddush wine, jealousy is wiped out from my heart and, hopefully, from the hearts of mankind."

The Wizard of Oy

by Daniel Bouskila

WHAT HAPPENS WHEN A rabbi sits down to watch The Wizard of Oz with his three-year-old daughter? Well, in addition to a trip down memory lane (or is it down the yellow brick road!), and the joy of watching my daughter singing and dancing, I had, of all things, a spiritual revelation. It dawned on me that the various characters and motifs in this story share a remarkable similarity to the spiritual and mystical world of Jewish prayer, and our holy day of Shabbat.

Jewish prayer? Shabbat? The Wizard of Oz? I know it sounds a bit odd, but join me on a unique journey down the "Yellow Brick Road of Jewish Prayer," and you will discover that the Scarecrow, the Tin Man, the Lion and Dorothy will help you open up a whole new world of spirituality within you.

Our journey begins with the Talmudic teaching that in order to pray properly, one must have full "kavannah," translated as "concentration." Only with kavannah, a deep meditative concentration, can a meaningful and spiritually uplifting prayer experience be attained.

We journey from the Talmud to the Kabbalah, where the Jewish mystics seek a more specified definition and understanding of kavannah. The kabbalists speak of two types of kavannah: concentration of our thoughts, and concentration of our hearts. When a person approaches G-d through the medium of prayer, both the intellect and the emotions must be synchronized and focused upon the Divine. In other words, in order to experience G-d, you need brains and a heart, and you have to use them properly.

So far, our journey resembles that of the Scarecrow and the Tin Man, who traveled down the yellow brick road in search of brains and a heart.

But our journey continues. There is an additional challenge that lies ahead. As we seek to synchronize our brains and hearts to create a meaningful encounter with the divine, we are faced with the prospect of the fears and insecurities we all have in coming before G-d. If we stop to think about what it means to actually be in G-d's presence, it is a frightening experience. In other words, in order to approach G-d's throne, we need to find the courage to do so. It takes courage for a human being to ask G-d to forgive his sins and answer his prayers.

So our journey now adds an additional character: the Lion, who traveled down the yellow brick road in pursuit of courage.

The quests for intellectual and emotional kavannah, together with our inner search for courage to stand before G-d, are not easily attained. To help us achieve these goals, the majority of the formal Jewish prayer service is recited in unison, as a community. Every Shabbat in synagogue, we all chant a series of biblical Psalms, Rabbinic prayer compositions and the "Shema Yisrael", all communal prayers designed to build our kavannah and inner strength. In other words, we travel the "yellow brick road of the prayer service" together, much like our friends the Scarecrow, the Tin Man and the Lion.

Our journey through the prayer service brings us to the "Amidah" prayer. The word "Amidah" means "standing," because we recite the Amidah while standing at attention, with both feet together. The Amidah moves us away from communal prayer, as we now enter the domain of private meditation.

In the movie, the characters entered the wizard's chambers together, but they each approached him individually. If you have ever read the book The Wizard of Oz, each character has its own private audience with the wizard.

What about Dorothy and her desire to "go home"? The climax of the week in Jewish life is Shabbat. Throughout the week, as we race through our lives from one place to another, our spirit yearns for Shabbat, our weekly opportunity to be home with family and friends. When the sun sets on Friday night and the candles shine brightly on our lavishly adorned Shabbat tables, we breathe a sigh of relief with a "there's no place like home" kind of feeling racing through our bodies and embracing our souls. In Jewish prayer, one of the most prominent themes is the "homelessness" of the Jewish nation. Throughout our communal and individual prayers, we express a strong desire to return to the physical and spiritual home of the Jewish nation, the Land of Israel. The multitude of references to Zion and Jerusalem in our prayers evokes our message to G-d that when we think of Israel, we realize that "there is no place like home."

Hard to believe that sitting with my daughter, watching The Wizard of Oz, I had these spiritual revelations, but it is true. And all of a sudden, just as my thoughts, emotions and inner strengths were prepared to face G-d, I felt my daughter shaking me and saying, "Daddy, wake-up, it's time to go to the synagogue." Oy.

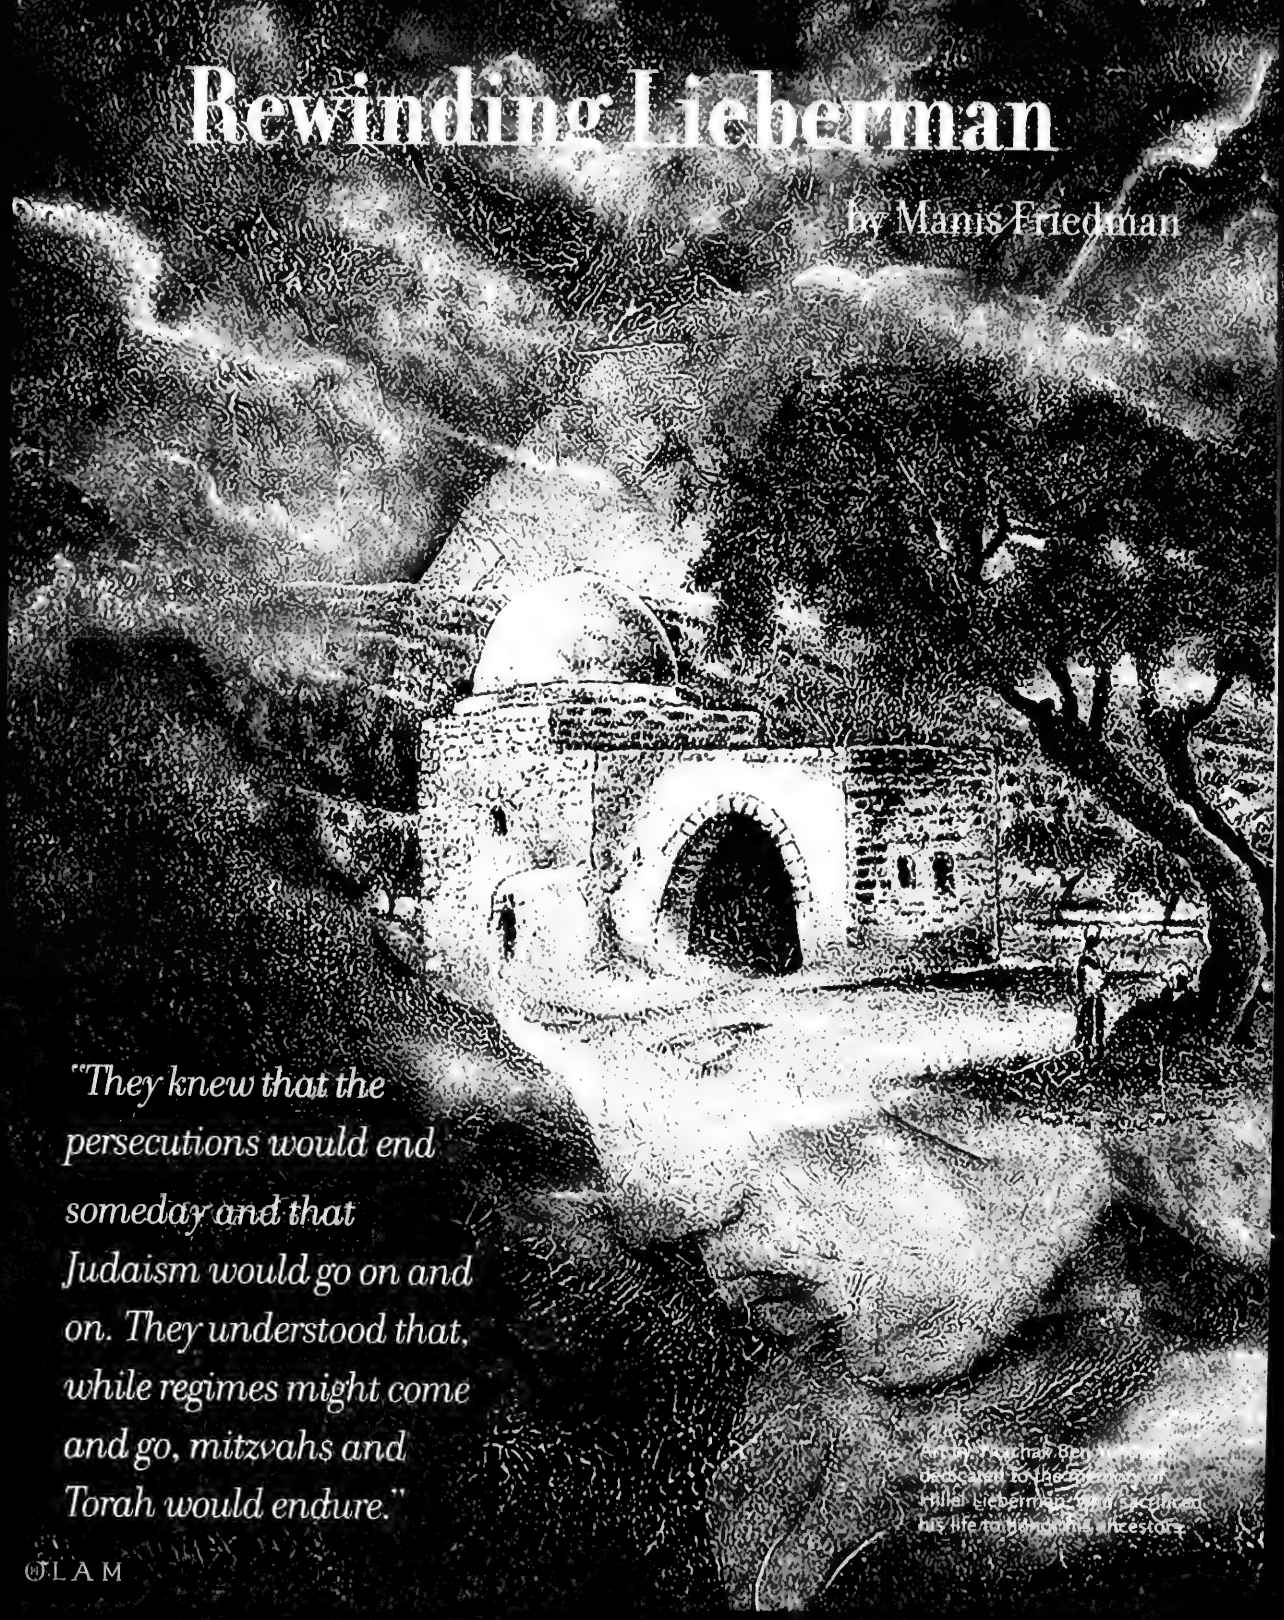
Rewinding Lieberman

by Manis Friedman



"They knew that the persecutions would end someday and that Judaism would go on and on. They understood that, while regimes might come and go, mitzvahs and Torah would endure."

Did you ever think that the front page news in America would focus on issues such as "When does Shabbos begin?" "When does it end?" "Is using the telephone permissible?" "What can be done in an emergency?"

The ancient rulings of Talmudic scholars are newly relevant. It has become a clear and immediate concern for America and the world. The way a Jew serves and believes is newly inspiring.

But while the media is marveling over the character of one Jew, Joseph Lieberman, perhaps we should also reflect on the circumstances that make it possible to be an observant Jew in the 21st Century.

How many times in our long and troubled history have we been forbidden to observe Shabbos? And under the Babylonians, the Greeks, the Persians, the communists, how often were we persecuted for observing the mitzvahs of the Torah? In our three thousand years of Jewish existence, how tempting it must have been to relax some of these observances; how rational and reasonable it must have seemed in the face of the relentless persecution.

But there were always a few unique individuals who stood out, who would not bow to their oppressors and, in spite of everything, maintained their Jewish identity without compromise.

They knew that the persecutions would end someday and that Judaism would go on and on. They understood that, while regimes might come and go, mitzvahs and Torah would endure.

These individuals displayed unquestioning faith, and we are the beneficiaries of their perseverance. Today, a Jew may be elected to the highest office in the land, without so much as changing his name to "Jones," let alone changing the way he eats or observes the Shabbos.

Hail to our parents who taught us that we are Jews and showed us how to live as Jews.

Hail to our ancestors who believed in the eternity of the Jewish people.

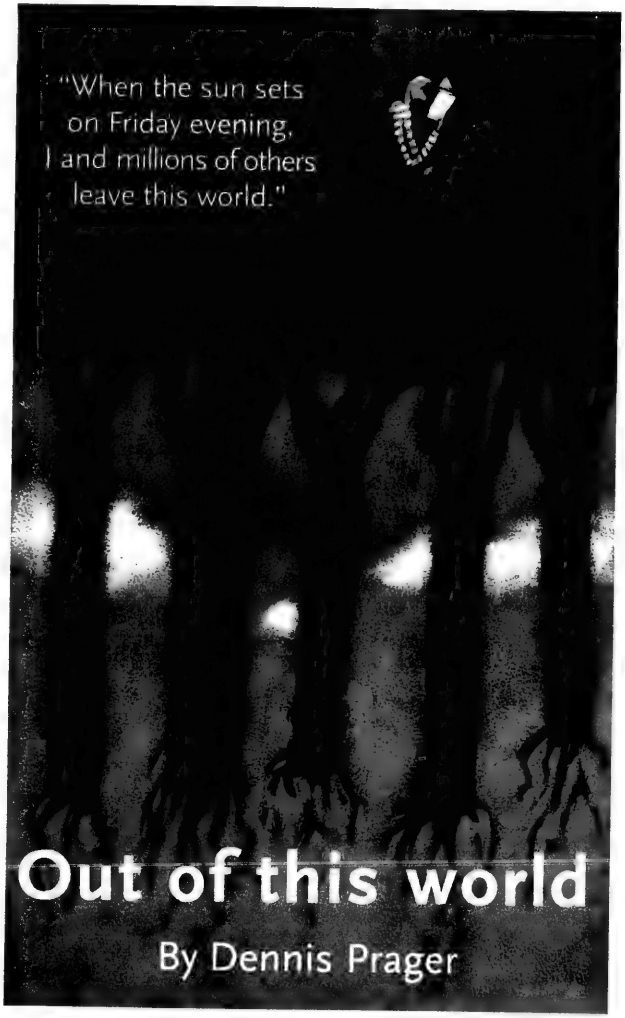
Out of this world

By Dennis Prager



Is your family important to you? This is, of course, a rhetorical question. Yet, imagine being asked to write an essay explaining why family is so important. Most of us would find it a daunting task.

That is how I feel about Shabbat. I know how important, indeed indispensable, Shabbat is to me and to millions of others, but it is not easy to explain why to those who have not lived it (or lived it in homes that practiced it joylessly). The attempt must be made, however, for I am convinced that adopting Shabbat in one's life is the greatest addition one can make to improve one's family life and one's ability to cope with life's difficulties.

Why?

Perhaps the best explanation for Shabbat's importance is this: Do you ever feel that you wish the world would stop so that you could, as it were, catch your breath? Do you ever feel, in the words of the Broadway musical: "Stop the world I want to get off"? The chances are that you do since life is very intense and it moves at a faster pace than ever.

When the sun sets on Friday evening, I and millions of others leave this world. The worries of the week, of work, and of the world disappear for an entire day. I do not work, do not think about work, do not think about bills, and do not even know what is happening in the world. Because my work as a radio talk show host involves daily reading of many magazines and newspapers, I refuse to read them on Shabbat. And since I also do not listen to radio or watch television on Shabbat, I truly am oblivious to the outside world. It is impossible to overstate the value of such a retreat. On Shabbat, my world contracts to family, friends, and God.

If you entered my or most any home while celebrating Shabbat, you would be struck by the carefree and peaceful atmosphere, by the sense that none of us had anything troubling on our minds, and that there seemed to be unlimited time for everyone in the home to devote to everyone else in the home. My wife marvels that on Shabbat I am oblivious to time. Whereas on any other day she can read on my face "I have so much work to do," my anxiety is gone all of Shabbat. That is why, for example, the Friday night Shabbat dinner takes so long – there is simply nothing else to do. This is also why Shabbat is known for providing an auspicious opportunity for couples to engage in sexual intimacy – again, there is little else to do.

Judaism has always recognized the singular importance of Shabbat. It is the only ritual in the Ten Commandments and, with the exception of Yom Kippur, is the holiest day of the year, even though it occurs 52 times a year. It is so central to a Jew's life and so looked forward to, that the other days of the week have no Hebrew names; they are merely numbered by their proximity to Shabbat. Sunday is Yom Rishon B'Shabbat, "the first day toward Shabbat," Monday is Yom Sheni, "the second day...," etc. I learned these names of the days as a child, but I did not understand why they were enumerated until adulthood. For the truth is that I do enumerate the days counting up to Shabbat, so much so that Thursday after work, I actually begin to get excited. And Friday is downright exhilarating.

Then, Friday as the sun sets, it arrives. No one in the family is going to work, no one is going out, no one is going to the computer, no one has to catch a TV show. All of us are there only to be with each other and make Shabbat.

How is this idyllic state achieved? By separating one's home and personal conduct from weekday concerns, from the secular, from the worldly, from the financial, as much as possible. And this is best done by following some fairly simple guidelines.

First, and most obvious, try to avoid secular work. Shabbat and going to the office cannot coexist. As a young boy in yeshiva in Brooklyn, I had a friend whose father operated a candy store. Such businesses had to be open on Saturdays or they could not make a profit. But while the father worked, his wife and son always went to synagogue, and Shabbat was observed in the home.

Second, and just as important, turn off the TV and radio. The moment the radio or TV is turned on, Shabbat is turned off. Television and radio cannot coexist with Shabbat. This is easily demonstrated. As difficult as it may seem, try four Shabbatot without radio or TV. You will find that this has a transforming effect on everyone in your home. It will increase peace (Shabbat Shalom, after all, is the goal of Shabbat) and dramatically increase conversation among all those present in the house.

Third, engage in rituals such as lighting Shabbat candles, blessing the children, making kiddush over the wine, and reciting Hamotzi over the challah. Our secular age has foolishly denied the indispensable power of rituals in our lives.

Finally, remember that you do not have to be Orthodox to observe Shabbat. You only have to have a yearning for greater depth, greater meaning, and greater human intimacy in your life. And who among us does not yearn for this?

ROAMING THE WILDERNESS

BY JUDITH REGAN

IT HAS BEEN YEARS SINCE I TOOK TIME OFF WITH MY CHILDREN.

They are busy with school and afterschool sports and piano lessons and SAT prep and the alternate weekends and Wednesdays that my daughter must spend with her father. I am busy building a business, adjusting to my changing hormones and running back and forth to court, where I have been in litigation for almost the entire decade of the '90s, engaged in a spiritually deadening war with a man who left after I'd given birth and who now wants to destroy me. My schedule is killing me. Up at 5. Work. Litigation. Children's homework. Get ready for the show. The nails. The eyebrows. My daughter's uniform needs to be ironed. I have to testify that I am a good and dutiful mother. My mother needs a doctor. I have three books that are crashing on a tight schedule and the art director, a single man with no responsibilities, wants to take a sabbatical to meditate in India. The life is getting to be too much for him.

Right now, there is no rest. There is no time for joy or love or restoration.

And now, pivotal moment frozen in time, out of the mouths of babes, my babe, my 6'2" tall babe, comes this:

"It's too late..."

"For years, Mom, I waited for you to get home from work. I wouldn't go to sleep till you got home. For years I waited for you to stop working late and working weekends. And I don't begrudge you any of your hard work because you gave me a great education and provided me with opportunities I never would have had, and I thank you so much for making those sacrifices so I could have all these wonderful things. But it's too late."

I look at him in the afternoon sun, my son, tanned and fit, strong and movie star handsome, a great student at MIT, a gentleman to women, with the best the world has to offer at his fingertips and yet, it is true. I have failed him. And I know it.

MOMMY, READ TO ME. I CAN'T. I HAVE TO FINISH THIS. GIVE ME A FEW MINUTES. MOMMY, TELL ME A STORY. MAYBE TOMORROW. MOMMY, CAN WE GO OUTSIDE? I NEED TO DIG. WE LIVE IN THE CITY NOW. NO PLACE TO DIG.

Mommy, will you sleep with me until the sun comes up? I can't. Not now. Go to bed. Maybe later. Maybe tomorrow. Maybe next weekend. After the big meeting next week. After my divorce. Maybe when I feel better and have more energy.

I remember a time when I had time. Every Sunday my large Italian family would gather, after church, and we would feast. Long tables of food, fresh baked bread, tomatoes from the garden, homemade wine from my grandmother's purple grapes, huge bowls of salad, and cousins everywhere. We would feast and laugh, three generations, joined together. Mangia! Every weekend, despite the week's struggles, we reminded ourselves, life is beautiful. What happened to those Sundays? What happened to that family?

The relatives are gone. Many have moved away. Some have died. Very few are still married. Many of the fathers have drifted away. Some haven't seen or called their children in years. Sometimes, at funerals, we bump into each other and we are amazed. Who are these people who have grown so old? Are those my cousins with whom we squeezed into a single bed while our parents stayed up all night talking in the kitchen?

We are the children who have more money than our parents or grandparents. We live in grander homes, have medical, law or business degrees. We have stock. We have options. We can have children at any age. We refuse to age. We have frequent flier miles and Palm Pilots and dazzling lives. We have become so efficient, we don't even have to talk anymore. We live in a world never imagined by our immigrant grandparents who fled poverty and oppression.

Our children know little of their great-great-grandparents' world. They are immersed in their own stunning and constantly stimulating lives – a world of unimaginable high-speed learning and technology. They are world travelers, surfing though a mélange of erotic images, negotiating their way through 700 channels and four billion websites, all with endless possibilities. And yet...

"Mommy, I'm bored," my daughter announces after a day of video arcades, roller blading, eating out, pumpkin carving and instant messaging her friends. She is nine, and burned out. Been there, done that. It is a modern condition, what the ancient monks called acedia. She is bored to death while at the same time bombarded by stimulation.

What can I say?

"Honey, if you are bored it means that you have too much."

"Sweetie, I love you, but I am spoiling you rotten."

"My child, do you not know what value your life has?"

I say nothing. I say nothing because I fear that I have failed her. I have failed to teach her the meaning of life, to show her what my grandparents showed me. They are not here when she gets home from school. No one is. I am at work. I have no time. I have no time for my family. No time to breathe. No time to think.

"No time" is my generation's bragging right.

I DREAM ABOUT FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, KNEADING BIG VATS OF DOUGH WITH MY GRANDMOTHER. I MISS PLAYING CARDS WITH UNCLE PHILLIE. I MISS PICKING BLUEBERRIES WITH PA AND MAKING FORTS WITH MY BROTHERS. I MISS THE SNOWBALL FIGHTS.

And when things get rough in court, I think about those Sundays, lounging on a bed of plush, velvet green moss, staring at the blue sky, rested.

"Remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy. Six days you shall labor and do all your work, but the seventh day is a Sabbath of the Lord, your G-d: you shall not do any work...For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth and sea, and all that is in them, and he rested on the seventh day: therefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath and sanctified it." (Exodus 20:8-11)

It is Friday and I am enjoying a Shabbat dinner at the home of a rabbi friend. I am invited to celebrate their joy. The food is beautiful, their six children are enchanting. They remind me of growing up in my own family of five children. I watch as each child is blessed by his or her father. I see how they are loved and cherished. My spirit aches for a weekly ritual that honors tradition, a Sabbath night that is an invitation to joy. Here candles are lit, songs are sung and we are reminded of the meaning of life.

"These are the words which the Lord has commanded that ye should do them. Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you a holy day, a Sabbath of solemn rest to the Lord..." (Exodus 25:1-3)

My family has no seventh day. My daughter is bored. My son says it's too late. And I am exhausted. We live in a 24-hour-you-can-have-whatever-you-want-delivered-right-now-culture, but we have no pleasure. Our death is the spiritual wilderness in which we roam, searching for a moment of human connection in a morass of materialism.

I observe the Sabbath with the Rabbi and his family. His children remind me of what is possible. And it is on this Sabbath evening that I see a ray of light in the kindness of husband and wife, parent and child, friend and friend. And I know that despite the spiritual wilderness in which I roam, that despite the work, the court battles, the velocity of our modern lives, I know where I must go. Where we must go. We should follow the light I see in the faces of those children as their father blesses them. That is the Sabbath light. The light that eternity utters a day

INFUSES OUR LIVES WITH MEANING.

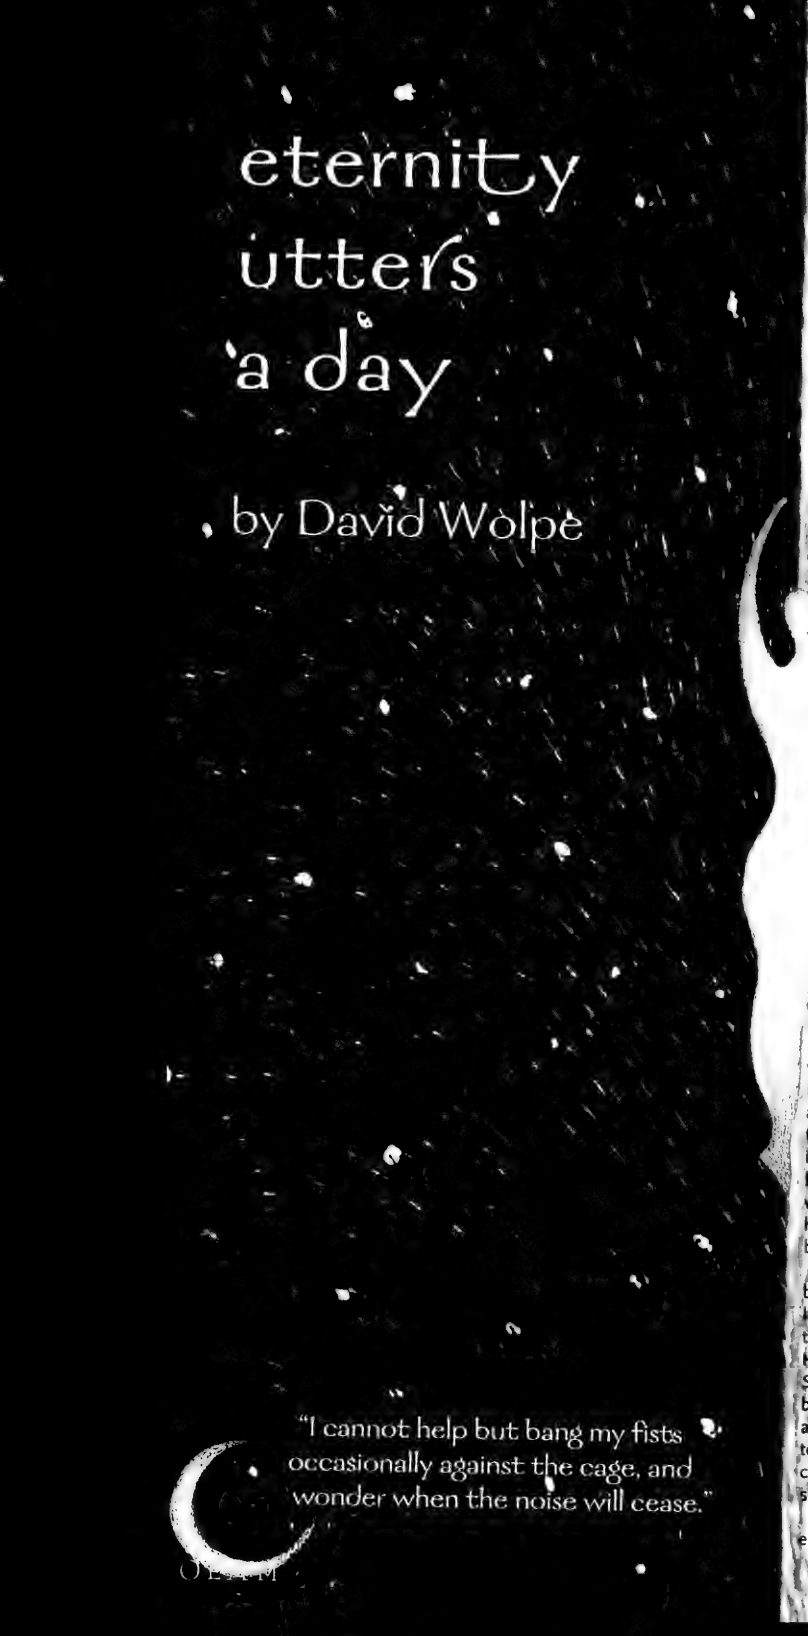
by David Wolpe



"I cannot help but bang my fists occasionally against the cage, and wonder when the noise will cease."

The modern world never whispers. As I drive in my car, the shrill voice of the announcer, punctuated by the even more urgent voice of the commercial, demands attention. On each street corner, billboards and signs and promises swirl around me as though I have stepped into an arcade of clanging bells and video games. But the arcade is the city, and there is no exit. I recognize that I am part of this pageant, that I choose to be here, and that the mania is the price of the vibrance and variety.

At home, I can turn on the television and the computer. Each catapults me into another life, another part of the world. I am "linked" – a word all too close to being chained. Still I turn them on, because I do not wish to turn away from my own time. I have taught history, and learned too well that the past is no panacea; neon signs and phone calls at dinner are hardly enough to make me forget the blessings of vaccinations, sanitation and reliable shelter. I live in this world, and yet I cannot help but bang my fists occasionally against the cage, and wonder when the noise will cease, and the bliss, promised in every advertisement for every product from automobiles to hand soap, will at last be mine.

Friday Night arrives. I know what my task is at this moment: I am to stop affecting the world and live in harmony with it. Even though I am a tangle of yearnings, on this day everything is to be perfect. I am to be satisfied with the many blessings that I have in my life. For once, I am to be at peace with the universe.

Yet again I remember a little book. It is less than a 100 pages long, but carries the wisdom of the ages. It was written by A. J. Heschel and is called The Sabbath. Heschel teaches me the blessing of technology – it obliterates distance. I can turn on my television and be part of life in a country across the globe. The lesson of space is the beginning.

The world changed, wrote the essayist E. B. White, on the day a man walked on the moon. It changed because for the first time millions of people chose to stay inside and watch the moon on a screen in their living rooms rather than step outside and see the thing directly. In other words, we preferred the obliteration of distance, even if it meant seeing the world through a lens. Back in 1950, when he wrote The Sabbath, Heschel knew the meaning of that change. For he teaches me that although technology conquers space, we do not live our lives in space alone. We live in time. "This is the task of men: to conquer space and sanctify time."

My friends have no time. Their lives are crowded. They do not see their friends, play with their overscheduled children, put their feet up and stare out the window. They cannot; they must drive somewhere, check their email, return phone calls – in other words, conquer space.

But even if we correspond at the touch of a button with others around the world, technology does not sanctify time. We do. God's greatest gift is to endow human beings with the capacity to perceive – and to create – holiness.

Jews have not, through their wanderings, had the leisure or the need to build grand cathedrals. Yet we have celebrated the Sabbath, a cathedral in time. It can be celebrated in a ramshackle hut, in a cave, in a barren field. The sanctity of time requires not technology but devotion of soul.

So on Friday night I stop. Before the candles and the wine we sing, and my wife and I bless our beautiful little girl. She is not yet four years old. She has not yet heard of Heschel, but she understands him.

It takes only three things, wrote this sage, to create a sense of significant being: God, a soul and a moment. And the three, he said, are always present.

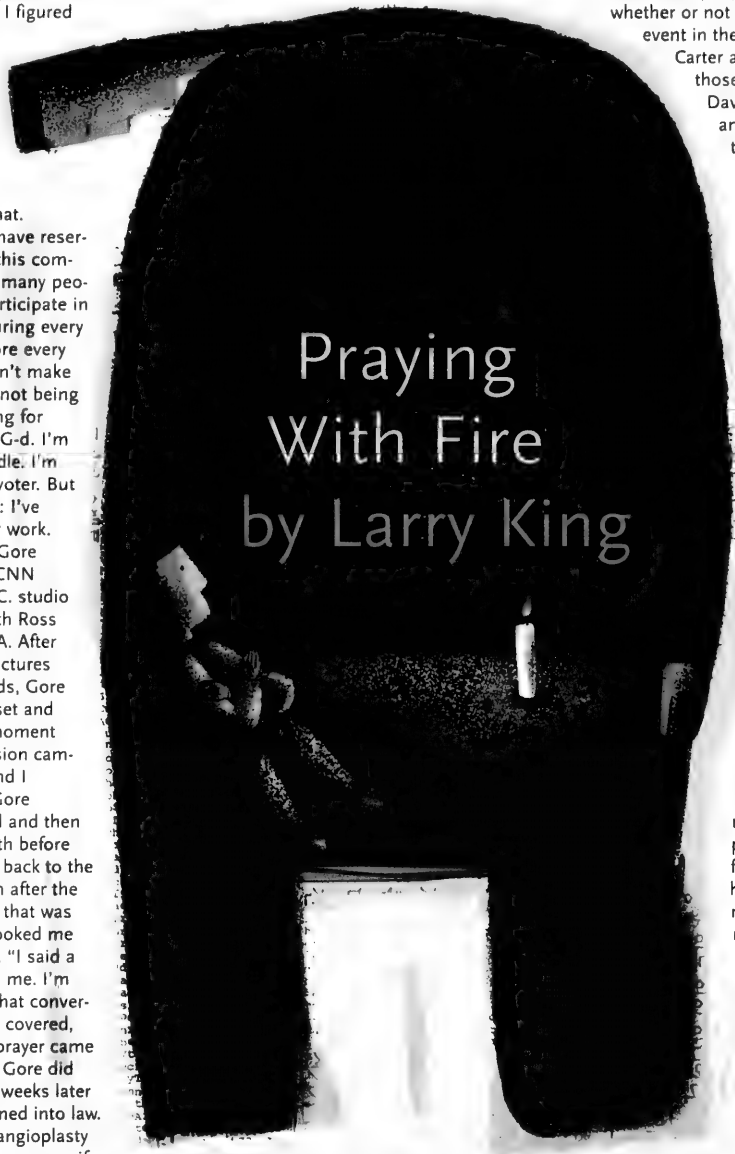
Praying With Fire

by Larry King



The first time I prayed was Autumn 1949. The Brooklyn Dodgers were playing the New York Yankees in the World Series and I was a 15-year-old sitting in the cheapest Ebbett's Field seats. The Dodgers, as usual, were losing. I said a prayer that afternoon that G-d might see fit to give my team a break. G-d didn't and the Dodgers lost not only that game but the Series (the Yankees took it four games to one). I figured G-d was a Yankees fan and the two of us didn't have many conversations, much less prayers, after that.

Today, I still have reservations about this communication so many people say they participate in every day or during every conflict or before every game. I just can't make that leap from not being sure, to knowing for sure there is a G-d. I'm still in the middle. I'm the undecided voter. But I'll tell you this: I've watched prayer work.

I watched Al Gore come into the CNN Washington D.C. studio for a debate with Ross Perot on NAFTA. After we posed for pictures and shook hands, Gore walked off the set and spent a quiet moment next to a television camera. As Perot and I watched him, Gore bowed his head and then took a big breath before turning to walk back to the set. I asked him after the debate what all that was about and he looked me right in the eye. "I said a prayer", he told me. I'm not sure what that conversation with G-d covered, but I think his prayer came true that night. Gore did well, and a few weeks later NAFTA was signed into law.

Before I had angioplasty performed in 1997, my wife Shawn brought a few close friends into the hospital room. I thought it was a nice gesture to show support for what I was about to go through. But Shawn was a devout Mormon and as soon as everyone was gathered around the bed, they all said a prayer that the doctors, and Larry, would do well. I stayed quiet, but I'll tell you this: I was thinking the same thing. Looking back, that might have been a prayer.

A year later I wrote a book about this conversation so many people have with a supreme something. I have made a living having conversations with people, but never asked them about whether or not they say a prayer before a major event in their lives. I spoke with Jimmy Carter about the prayers he said during those tough negotiations at Camp David between Egypt's Anwar Sadat and Israel's Menachem Begin. I talked to David Crosby about his prayers while he was trying to stay away from drugs and alcohol. I spoke with Muhammad Ali about his prayers before he stepped into the boxing ring to fight Sonny Liston. In each case and in each story, these powerful and wellknown people asked for help. And this is where I started to learn about prayer. It's more than a conversation. It's more than a request for something to happen. Prayer is saying that you aren't running the show. It's saying you want to do the right thing. Prayer is more about who we are than what we want to do.

Rabbi Irwin Katsof once told me a story about three farmers standing in a field during a horrible draught. They gathered in the same place every day to pray together that the skies would open up with much needed rain. They didn't, and the farmers were discouraged, but they continued to show up every morning to say their prayers. One morning a fourth farmer walks by and, after saying hello, asks what is going on. They respond, "We're praying for the rain. Our crops are almost dead and we are almost broke." The farmer looks at each of them and starts shaking his head. He tells the other three that their efforts, while well intentioned, will never work. The farmers ask why he is saying such a terrible thing. He tells them that it is because no one is standing in the field with an umbrella.

Prayer isn't just the words. It's also the heart with its passionate fire. And if you're a Yankees fan, it's usually a mortal lock.

"PRAYER IS SAYING THAT YOU AREN'T RUNNING THE SHOW."

CONFESSIONS OF A DEVOTED SKEPTIC

BY MICHAEL STEINHARDT

People have often asked why an avowed atheist like myself celebrates Shabbat.

While I rarely attend weekly services and can hardly be considered religiously observant, celebrating Shabbat has become an important fixture in my life. Each Friday my family, often joined by close friends, has dinner together. There are some religious aspects: We sing Shalom Aleichem and H'nay Matov, we light candles, say kiddush and bless the bread, but these beautiful rituals are really the background music.

For me, Friday night dinners mark the moment when the week changes from being intensely competitive and materialistic to a time when I begin to feel attuned to my family and the spiritual side of life.

Having dedicated the majority of my professional career to the investment world, my energy during the work week was focused on making money. Did I know more about a certain stock than the next guy did? Were my positions too small or big? Which way was the stock market going to move? What about the dollar vs. the yen?

For most of my 30-plus years on Wall Street, I worked long days, often long nights, and was intensely engaged in the process. When the sun began to set on Fridays, I could feel the tension begin to melt. I rarely looked forward to any special event or dinner as much as I did to the dependable dinners on Friday nights.

When my children were younger, my wife and I insisted upon the sanctity of Shabbat dinners together. There were, as my kids liked to say, "no excuses" for missing them. In retrospect, these dinners formed the core of my children's Jewish identity.

I caught up with my family on Friday night. I heard about the bad teachers, the difficult wrestling practices and the upcoming recitals. I had the opportunity to look at each of my children and my wife as if for the very first time. As much as I was intensely focused on the traditional sense of wealth during the week, when I blessed my children, I was infinitely more grateful for life's real riches.

In my business, it was easy to be consumed by the ups and downs of the market. And when I look back on my career, perhaps part of its success can be attributed to my own intensity. But if that intensity hadn't been punctuated by a period of rest and reflection, and if I hadn't been stopped in my tracks each week and in that way forced to prioritize, I don't think I would have been able to keep working with the same dedication.

I can't say that I observe Shabbat in the traditional way, although I often am envious of those who are able to do so. But if the aim of Shabbat is to pause, to focus on your family, to gain a clearer perspective, to feel a separation in time and space from the work week, then for me, Shabbat accomplishes its mission.

the gift of perspective

By Michael Medved

For me, the greatest gift of the Sabbath is the sense of perspective it provides – perspective on my work, on the world, and on myself.

When it comes to placing weekday activities in their proper context, the benefits of Sabbath observance seem fairly obvious. In today's two-earner households, we are too often consumed by career responsibilities. It's easy to attach undue importance to your workplace assignments – reports and deadlines and meetings and productivity goals. Once a week, the Sabbath tells you that these fleeting demands aren't nearly as significant as they seem. That incoming e-mail can wait until Saturday night, that crucial phone call can be postponed for 25 hours.

> "No one ever asked for an epitaph saying 'I wish I'd spent more time at the office.'"

Shabbat reminds us that small moments with family and friends count for more, ultimately, than big challenges in business. The old line that declares "No one ever asked for an epitaph saying 'I wish I'd spent more time at the office'" still holds true; every week Shabbat serves to remind us of that truth. The workweek, with its triumphs and frustrations and desperately hectic pace, will still be there for you when the Sabbath concludes. Once a week, however, it helps to remind yourself that serving The Boss is more important than working for the boss... and no, this has nothing to do with Bruce Springsteen.

One of the most liberating moments of my life occurred 16 years ago, when I was still a relative newcomer to Sabbath and holiday observance. In promoting one of my books, I'd been chasing the (you should pardon the expression) Holy Grail of publicity: a national TV appearance on The Tonight Show. When it finally came through, it turns out that they wanted me on the night of a Jewish holiday. Being able to say no taught me a great deal–particularly how silly, how inconsequential many of our passionate pursuits may seem in retrospect, even big deal developments like a guest appearance on Johnny Carson's show. As it turned out, I had my Yom Tov peace and got re-invited to do the show at another time.

Shabbat frees you from the tyranny of the daily demands that own the rest of your life. What could more significantly represent personal freedom than learning to let the phone ring without feeling compelled to pick it up? No wonder that the "Kiddush" on Friday night describes Shabbat as a reminder of the Exodus from Egypt. It separates us from our normal bondage each week.

The second area in which Shabbat delivers a precious perspective comes from its ability to refocus our attention on the world in which we live.

With car travel eliminated, you're suddenly forced to walk where you want to go. And walking in your own neighborhood, week after week, demands that you see that piece of the world with entirely fresh eyes. You notice things on Shabbat that you never notice as you whizz past during the week – the new flowers that your neighbor planted, or the different family that moved in down the block, or the tree whose leaves are just beginning to change. Thanks to mass media, we all try to imitate the Almighty to some extent and cast our omniscient gaze over the entire world, learning at a glance the latest developments from Tel Aviv to Timbuktu. With media intake suspended, Shabbat narrows your focus – letting you and your family become more intimately familiar with that teeming, vibrant little world in the place you call home.

Part of the idea is learning to accept that world as you receive it on Friday at sundown. We spend so much of our human effort trying to alter reality, trying to adjust our reality. It's this ability to exert creative (or destructive) effort that makes us uniquely human – and Godlike, created in his image. And like the Holy One, blessed be He, we pull back on the seventh day from our restless labors and rejoice in the work of creation – seeing this world as complete (if imperfect) in its own terms. We don't need to worry about remodeling the house or replanting the garden [illegible] than God needs to [illegible] replant His garden.

The third way in which the Sabbath encourages a better sense of perspective involves our connection to our Jewish brothers and sisters. At the same time Shabbat takes us temporarily out of the larger world, it forces us to reconnect with our fellow Jews. This is particularly true when you're away from home, but invariably thrown together with others who honor the Sabbath day. In the same way, Shabbat connects us with our past.

Sentimentality over your Bubbe "benching licht" (lighting the Sabbath candles) runs deep among most Jews – this household gesture speaks of connection and continuity, as do the many rituals (kiddush, motzi, zemiros) of the Shabbat table. When we bless our children, we establish the link with future generations.

The point of all this is a reminder that we are not alone. Jewish observance may seem weird, willful, alien – but it connects us with countless other people, alive and dead, in every corner of the earth. The Havdalah ceremony that marks the conclusion of the Sabbath praises the God who makes distinctions, "who separates between holy and secular, between light and darkness, between Israel and the nations, between the seventh day and the six days of labor." Creating in His image, following His model of creativity, we also emphasize distinctions. Perhaps not the separations with which God created the world – drawing distinctions between light and darkness, waters above from waters beneath, sea from dry land, and so forth. But in our own smaller separations, and for our own crucially separate identity as Jews, marking Shabbat as irreducibly different from the rest of the week would represent an ideal place to begin.

YOU SAY YOU WANT A REVOLUTION?
TRY SHABBAT

The United States has 5% of the world's population but it consumes 40% of the world's resources. Meanwhile, there are 30 million children who die each year of diseases connected to malnutrition and tens of millions of adults. We live in a society whose bottom line is money and power, and it worships those who have accumulated the most.

If you want to change any of this, you need Shabbat. Shabbat is the first step toward the revolution – and it was born out of the revolution of the Jews against the Pharoah in Egypt.

You don't have to think of yourself as religious or a believer in God to get the benefits of Shabbat – the Bible's most brilliant spiritual practice – nor to recognize that Shabbat may be the most important strategy for anyone interested in building a social movement capable of challenging the globalization of capital. In fact, Shabbat is an active embodiment of one of Judaism's most powerful claims: that spiritual healing and social transformation are and should be intrinsically linked, and that the same force that created the world (Elohim) is the identical same force that makes for the possibility of transformation (YHVH).

I know this will seem strange to many, but I grew up in a community where Shabbat simply meant going to a Friday night service. And when I got involved in the religious community in Israel, I found Shabbat to often be a day to say lots of prayers and have lots of good meals. It was only later in my rabbinical training that I fully got the revolutionary significance of Shabbat.

The central idea of Shabbat is to take twenty-five hours (from before sunset on Friday night to after dark Saturday evening) and dedicate that time to the celebration of all that is, and to explore what ought to be. The basic principles of this practice are the following: 1. Dedicate this day to joy, celebration, humor and pleasure, and 2. Let Go of Worry. It is forbidden to worry about work, money, power, control or anything else. All week long we focus on what is not yet happening and what needs to be different. Our energy goes into "getting things together" and "making things happen." On Shabbat the energy goes in a different direction: It is focused on what is already there in your life.

Shabbat requires that we focus on joy and awe and wonder at creation. Open yourself to the miracle and mystery of the universe. Disconnect from your computer, your phone, everything that connects you to a world of demands and anxiety. Don't do anything connected to work. Don't touch money, go shopping or in any other way connect to the world of getting and spending.

It's only when you start doing this as a regular practice that you'll see how many internal voices pop up that tell you are wasting your time by just having pleasure – that "really," you should be "doing something" like spending money or earning money.

Shabbat is the classic case of getting free from the tyranny of the marketplace. The more you practice Shabbat, the more you realize that money and power, fame and ego gratification, are not the ultimate good. Shabbat doesn't really fully "kick in" its most creative energies until about mid-afternoon for most people. It often takes at least that long, and sometimes several months of doing this practice, before the full transformative impact kicks in. But when it does, you will begin to find a quieting of the voices in your head that have been telling you all your life that you must achieve something and have a certain amount of money or power before your life can be judged worthwhile or successful.

With that quieting, you can begin to sink into a different state of consciousness in which you can more fully connect to another central insight of Judaism: that each of us is part of the unity of all being, a manifestation of God and created in God's image. The messages of Torah start to be accessible: that we should not only love our neighbor but also love the stranger.

"ONCE WE TAKE SERIOUSLY THAT THE WORLD COULD BE BASED ON GOD'S LOGIC AND NOT THE LOGIC OF DOMINATION AND CONTROL, THEN WE QUICKLY REALIZE THAT THERE IS NOTHING INEVITABLE ABOUT THE DESTRUCTIVE WAY ECONOMIC GLOBALIZATION HAS PROCEEDED."

In fact, as we read Torah from this changed consciousness that is made possible on Shabbat, the idea that human beings do not live by bread alone, as the biblical book of Devarim (Deuteronomy) puts it, seems less like a utopian fantasy and more like an accurate description of our deepest truth. It then becomes possible to imagine a very different kind of world – a world based on the notion of God as King of the earth (the king of the king of kings, as the Aleynu prayer puts it), a kingship that challenges the ultimacy of money or power of one human group over another. In fact, we can even begin to imagine a world based on love and caring, ethical/spiritual/ecological sensitivity, and awe and wonder.

Shabbat becomes an embodiment of what I describe in my new book Spirit Matters: Global Healing and the Wisdom of the Soul as "the new bottom line." In Shabbat terms, what is productive, efficient or rational is not what produces the most money or power but what produces the most love and caring, the most awe and wonder at the grandeur of creation.

So, once one starts thinking within the logic of Shabbat, there is a slippery slope right down to a profound disillusionment with the principles upon which the rest of the world is based. Shabbat is a taste of eternity, but a taste that is meant to inspire us to do tikkun (healing and transformation) of this world.

Once we take seriously that the world could be based on God's logic and not the logic of domination and control, then we quickly realize that there is nothing inevitable about the destructive way economic globalization has proceeded. We can challenge the globalization of capital on the most important grounds: It does not facilitate an expansion of Shabbat consciousness but rather tries to remake the world in the image of capital. Yet the message of Shabbat is this: The world is not a resource to be endlessly consumed for the sake of somebody's profits, it is a sacred trust to which the appropriate response is radical amazement and celebration.

Imagining a world in which money and domination of nature are not the ultimate values has become difficult today, the more the pace of thinking has been sped up by computers and television. Shabbat is the ultimate subversion of the dominant logic and so becomes one of the most revolutionary challenges to marketplace consciousness. And if you have been part of a community that celebrated Shabbat and didn't feel that alternative consciousness, you haven't yet experienced Shabbat.

The final brilliance of Shabbat is that it's a communal experience as well as a time for privacy and inwardness. Spiritual practices that are totally individual and inward sometimes make it difficult for people involved to stand up to the challenges of living in a world that has such an anti-spiritual bias. The support of a community of people who are giving each other permission to live by a different logic gives Shabbat a special revolutionary depth and sustainability.

In fact, Shabbat came into the world as a symbol of the first revolutionary victory against the slave system of Egypt. We declared to the world that we would not work one day a week, and that the oppressors could kill us but we would not work. That was how the first revolutionary struggle was won – and Jews created the idea of the weekend! And it is in keeping with that same consciousness that we as Jews need to challenge the dominance of money and power in our society, and the way that those values have slipped into our own minds.

Shabbat is the way to take the decisive step toward a revolutionary consciousness that will not accept the world as fixed and shaped by pain and cruelty. Shabbat is our constant reminder that "what is" all week long is not the ultimate, but only a momentary blip that can and will be changed.

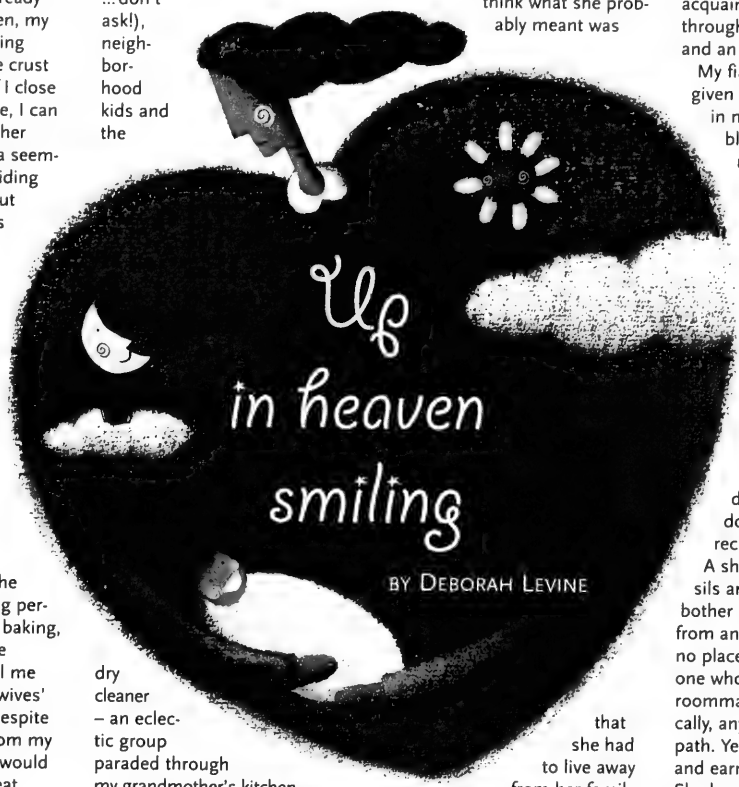
Up in heaven smiling

BY DEBORAH LEVINE



If I slept at my grandma's house on any given Thursday night, I'd wake up Friday morning to find huge ceramic bowls, filled with challah dough and covered with checkered dishcloths, sitting on the radiator; cinnamon buns dotted with raisins and laced with sugar, rising on the counter; garlic sticks slathered with olive oil and salt, lined up on trays next to the stove; and loaf pans filled with molasses cake batter already baking in the oven. Often, my grandma would be peeling apples or rolling out the crust for pie that even now, if I close my eyes and concentrate, I can still taste. All the while, her hands were dancing in a seemingly effortless ballet, gliding from task to task, without recipes, food processors or microwave ovens.

My Grandma Bessie was exotic, with haunting dark eyes and shiny jet black hair set against creamy white skin. At seventeen, she married Eli Newell who brought her, somewhat unwillingly, from Philadelphia to Cohoes, New York, a tiny and isolated mill town upstate.

To my childish eyes, she was the most astounding person. In the midst of her baking, she would give me some dough to "work" and tell me some bubbamissas (old wives' tales) that I could not, despite my best efforts, erase from my mind. For example, she would say, "Debby, don't ever eat chocolate ice cream, only vanilla, because chocolate ice cream is brown and they hide things in it." Or, "Pinch your nose one hundred times a day and train it to be skinny."

Strangely, I never wondered why Grandma would go to such great lengths to prepare these delicacies for essentially no one. She had a small family: my uncle, my parents, my sister and me. But on Friday you would have thought she had scores of relatives. Grandma considered baking her "work", and I, her naive but ever-willing accomplice, thought it was immensely important.

As morning turned into afternoon, one masterpiece after another would be completed, and an intoxicating aroma filled her house. Slowly, one after the other, a steady stream of visitors would appear at her door. The insurance man, the milkman, the grocer across the street, the landlady (who shot her husband ...don't ask!), neighborhood kids and the dry cleaner – an eclectic group paraded through my grandmother's kitchen every Friday afternoon. She made conversation with each and never allowed anyone to leave "without a little something."

Did Grandma Bessie welcome guests to her house because it was a Jewish value? Did inviting people make her home more Jewish? I'm not sure. But I do know that baking was reserved for Friday, for Erev Shabbat. I vividly recall her tearing off a piece of challah dough before she began baking, reciting a b'racha (a blessing) and then discarding it. She put her own theological spin on this custom by teaching me that the ripping of the challah was to remind us of less fortunate people who didn't have enough to eat. Then, finally when the kitchen was clean, she would tenderly throw a white tablecloth on the kitchen table and bench licht (light Sabbath candles).

Grandpa Eli had brought her to, as she called it, a "Godforsaken place." But I think what she probably meant was that she had to live away from her family and her old Jewish neighborhood. I can only guess that, in some way, Grandma's baking and feeding strangers was her way of bringing Judaism along with her.

She died when I was thirteen, so I really didn't have her for very long. When I cook during the week, I seldom think of her. But when I'm preparing for Shabbat or Yom Tov (festivals), there are moments when I feel as though she is peering approvingly over my shoulder. I always make that "little extra" in case someone drops by. Somehow, I manage to whip up many dishes at the same time, something I never do Monday through Thursday. I prepare foods specifically so they have the aroma of Shabbat. I want my children to anticipate its approaching from the lovely smells that only homemade goodies can engender. My home is open to friends and family, as well as the guy who bought my used Toyota, the acquaintance who is going through a divorce, kids galore and an autistic neighbor.

My firstborn Rachel was given the middle name "Bess" in memory of my incorrigible grandma. Rachel made her entrance into the world kicking and screaming, and, from heaven, stole Grandma's coal black eyes, jet black hair and contrary nature. Rachel Bess grew from a baby into a college girl in what seemed like moments. And now, she calls me on the phone to say, "Mommy ...I'm making Shabbat dinner for fifteen people, do you have a good recipe for chicken cutlets?" A shortage of space, utensils and appliances doesn't bother her. She invites the kid from another college who has no place to go for Shabbat, the one who is a bit antisocial, roommates, friends and, basically, anyone who crosses her path. Yes, she made Dean's list and earned an "A" in anatomy. She has a life outside of the kitchen, of which I am tremendously proud. But what does she brag about? "I made such a delicious Shabbat dinner. I invited six people, but then at the last minute, three more showed up. We had such a great time." Grandma Bessie must be up in heaven, kvelling.

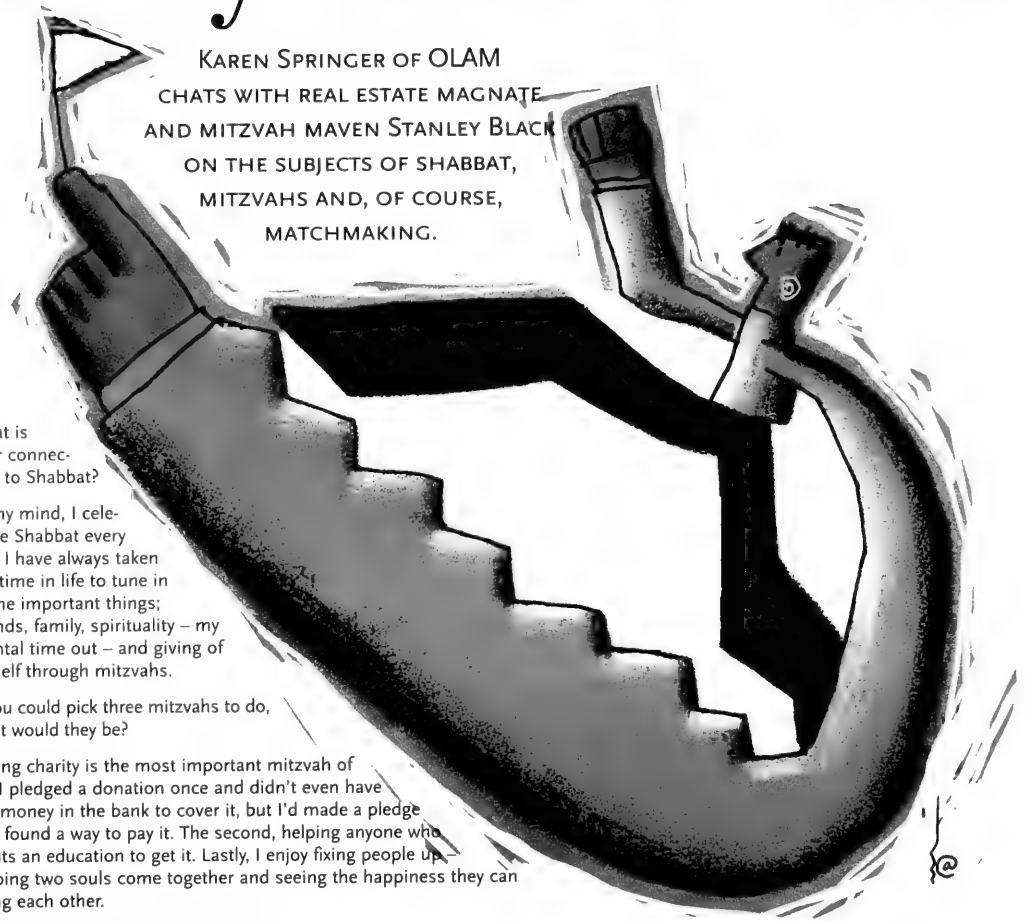
Stanley: Black on White

KAREN SPRINGER OF OLAM CHATS WITH REAL ESTATE MAGNATE AND MITZVAH MAVEN STANLEY BLACK ON THE SUBJECTS OF SHABBAT, MITZVAHS AND, OF COURSE, MATCHMAKING.



Q: What is your connection to Shabbat?

A: In my mind, I celebrate Shabbat every day. I have always taken the time in life to tune in to the important things; friends, family, spirituality – my mental time out – and giving of myself through mitzvahs.

Q: If you could pick three mitzvahs to do, what would they be?

A: Giving charity is the most important mitzvah of all. I pledged a donation once and didn't even have the money in the bank to cover it, but I'd made a pledge so I found a way to pay it. The second, helping anyone who wants an education to get it. Lastly, I enjoy fixing people up – helping two souls come together and seeing the happiness they can bring each other.

Q: Can you tell us about your success rate?

A: No comment!

Q: What is your earliest memory of a "spiritual experience"?

A: My parents were not religious, yet I wanted a Bar Mitzvah. I went to a synagogue and was not taken too seriously by the rabbi, but I didn't give up. I found another synagogue and the Cantor took me under his wing. He was warm and inviting. Instead of criticizing me for not knowing, he taught me, and his lessons remain with me to this day.

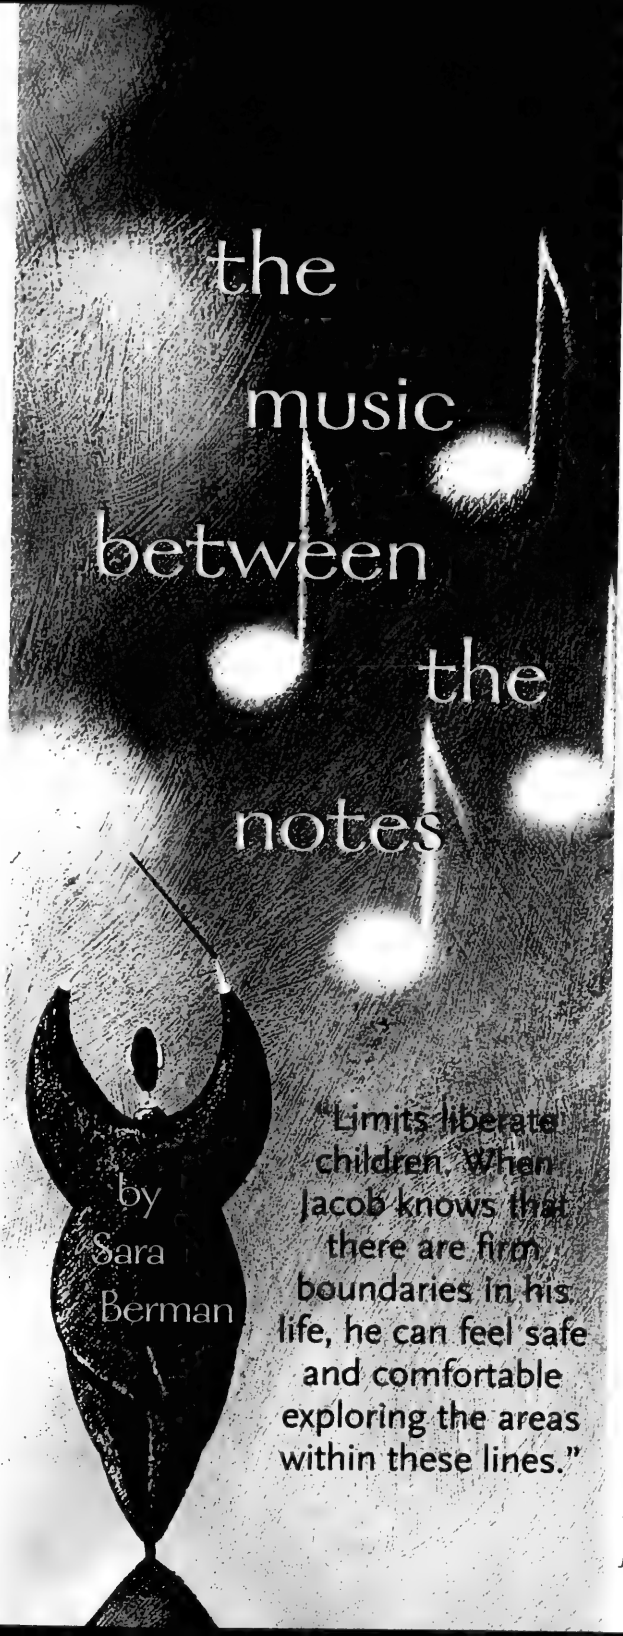
Q: Earlier you said that as a child growing up in America during WWII, you felt helpless – wanting to save the Jews in Europe, but unable to do so. Do you think that feeling of helplessness is what prompts you to be so giving and make a difference in people's lives now that you can?

A: I never thought of it that way before, but I suppose you are right. I was taught by my parents and grandparents that as a value system, Judaism is rich. It teaches you to be giving and kind, to be honest and respectful, to be a good citizen and a good friend. Really, what else is there?

Q: What role should business leaders play in the community?

A: They should donate money and build homes/shelters, feed, clothe and educate the underprivileged in their communities. And they should not be afraid to do interviews like this one, to encourage other leaders of the community to chip in for the common good. By the way, can I show you a picture of my son?

the music between the notes



by Sara Berman

A famous pianist was once asked by an admirer how he handled the notes as well as he did. The pianist answered that he handled the notes no better than many artists, but that the pauses between the notes – that was where the art resided.

I often think about the importance of the pauses. Since I was a child, while not observant, my family's one overriding tradition was a Shabbat dinner together every Friday night. And now, with two children of my own, my husband and I have continued the same tradition.

There are religious aspects to these dinners, such as candle lighting and kiddush, but what makes these dinners so special is that we are all together. During my childhood and still today, it is difficult to find the time for us all to sit and share a meal.

These weekly dinners are my pause; they create a dependable rhythm in my life that not only reinvigorates my body and mind, but more importantly, allows me to live more freely during the other six days of the week. It wasn't until this past year that I fully appreciated this last point.

My oldest son, Jacob, is about to be two, and I have spent the past year struggling to set limits in his life, a process that does not come naturally to me. I often have to remind myself why Jacob can't stay up until 10 o'clock, come into my bed in the middle of the night or have the truck that he covets at the toy store.

Many people think setting limits for children is important because it prevents them from becoming spoiled. Some parents believe it is the only way that children will understand that they aren't the center of the universe. And maybe both these reasons are true.

But neither of these is the compelling reason that sticks in my mind when I decide to set a limit in Jacob's life. Limits liberate children. When Jacob knows that there are firm boundaries in his life, he can feel safe and comfortable exploring the areas within these lines. When Jacob knows what is acceptable and unacceptable, what is his and not his, what is safe and not safe, he is, in fact, free. And when he tests the limits and appears to be unhappy with the boundaries in his life, he is, on some level, making sure that the limits are still there.

"Limits liberate children. When Jacob knows that there are firm boundaries in his life, he can feel safe and comfortable exploring the areas within these lines."

And so it is with Shabbat. The pause at the end of the week is far more than just a day of rest. The effects of a day of reflection and attunement to the spiritual nature can be felt long after the day is over. It is, in fact, during the other six days of the week that the result of pausing on Shabbat can be felt most powerfully.

I can expend energy knowing that there will be a time to refuel. I am able to go a day or two without reflection because I know there is an appointed time when I will be able to take it all in. I am able to push harder and longer during the week because of what is waiting for me on the seventh day.

Often God's relationship with man is compared to a parent's relationship with his child, particularly when we are unable to fully understand God's actions. Parents, we reason, sometimes make their children do things that feel confining or even like a form of punishment. But in some cases, parents know best. And even if at the time these demands feel unjustified and punitive, eventually we realize that our parents only have our best interests at heart.

And, so too, with God's commandment to observe the Shabbat. What appears to be restrictive forces us to become expansive. The pauses between the notes make the music far sweeter and richer than it would ever be if it carried on uninterrupted.

Adam & Adam

BY SHMULEY BOTEACH

Happiness is an enigma in these modern times. [illegible] report being unhappy more than [illegible] has been [illegible]

[illegible] lections and he dedicates himself to [illegible]

But while there is wonder and glory connected to work Adam's [illegible] he is missing something of great value – his identity. His name isn't even Adam. It is "The Human," as in "And G-d created the human". He is the man who defines himself by what he does, rather than by what he is. He is the Armani-suited businessman who goes to pieces on vacations and sinks into depression after retirement. He is the disciplinarian parent who forces opinions and education onto his child and who attempts to mold his offspring through private schools, piano lessons, lacrosse, and SAT classes. He applies his principles of incessant labor to parenting, just as he does to his career. Identity is earned only through work, worth only through accomplishment.

In the second chapter of Genesis, we discover Adam II, or, Rest Adam. Rest Adam is a reflective and contemplative creature. His posture is radically different from his corporate counterpart. Rather than achieve dominion over the earth as Work Adam aims to do, Rest Adam is instructed to "cultivate the Garden of Eden and to [illegible] it." He is created from the dust of the earth. He does not seek to [illegible] elements, but to be one with them. His task is not one of building [illegible] ying, not one of dominating but of nurturing.

[illegible] finds his identity in doing, Rest Adam in being. Work Adam is [illegible] with the external world, Rest Adam with the internal. All of the [illegible] energy that Work Adam uses to master the elements, Rest Adam uses [illegible] his own inner spirit. Work Adam is always lunging forward, while [illegible] Adam knows there is dignity in retreat.

[illegible] of our quest for contentment? "Happiness" is achieved only when [illegible] a careful balance between productivity and purposefulness, activity and contemplation. And herein lies the problem. We are unhappy today because Work Adam has almost completely smothered Rest Adam. Squandering our [illegible] human gifts, we have made ourselves into beasts of burden, born for the [illegible] rather than for spiritual yearning.

The Sabbath, once a panacea, is today a pain in the neck. Whereas the Sabbath was once the center of existence, today shops are open all week as people place themselves at the center of an ever-expanding circle of possessions, incarcerating the [illegible] self and suffocating the spirit. Even our moments of rest have lost their transcendence, as we escape into the fantasy world of television and film.

But we can liberate Rest Adam from the dark dungeon in which he is currently confined and reinvest him with his lost dignity. Society can once again champion those who work a full day but then leave work at a [illegible] reasonable hour to go home to their children.

[illegible] Adam can only be rescued by divorcing ourselves, at least one day a week, from all things electrical, technological and mechanical. Insulate yourself from all items that beep, ring, hum, flash and swirl. And perhaps then you will meet life's greatest blessing – a divine fusion of Work and Rest, with peace at your center.

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach is the Founder and Dean of the Shalom Society. He is the author of eleven books, including the international bestsellers Kosher Sex and Dating Secrets of the Ten Commandments.

"All of the creative energy that Work Adam uses to master the elements, Rest Adam uses to master his own inner spirit. Work Adam is always lunging forward, while Rest Adam knows there is dignity in retreat."

The miracle of paper plates

"May the Schwartz be with you", my father always says. Rabbi Shlomo Schwartz, known to all as "Schwartzee," is not your typical Rabbi. And my mother Olivia, a health food guru, is not your typical Rebbetzin. Together they run the Chai Center, an outreach organization that is decidedly, deliciously and divinely disorganized. They teach classes, offer free (yes, free) High Holiday services, and prepare Shabbat dinners in their home for "thirty strangers". And, in their spare time, they raise their twelve children.

As their child, I was most affected by our free Friday night Shabbat dinners.

Coming from a family of twelve with this as a weekly routine, you may imagine that budgeting became more than a small consideration.

That's why I have always marveled at my parents good will and trust in G-d. My father likes to say, "We're with the Chai Center, a VERY non-profit organization". Financially, we always lived on a tight budget, but no matter what, Friday night was "Dinner for 30 Strangers", and somehow, G-d would provide. Our Shabbat dinner settings were a true reflection of my parents non-materialistic mentality. We had no china, crystal, or matching flatware. So, out came the plastic cups and paper plates...tripling the plates so as not to have any salad dressing-leakage. Even plastic-laden, our table was fit for a king or, as in the case of Shabbat, a queen.

At 7:30 an eclectic mix of men and women would arrive. My sisters and I would greet the women and light the traditional Shabbat candle, while my brothers brought the men upstairs to our porch, overlooking L.A., where my father was entertaining. Then the women would join the men upstairs and we kids used to giggle as we watched the guests schmooze and flirt with one another. Meanwhile, mom would be in the kitchen finishing last minute preparations with her garlicky hummus, tofu stir fry, or her trademark homemade whole-wheat challah.

We drank the Kiddush, washed for the Challah, and my father would humorously share a few words on the weekly Torah portion. Then came the singing. My family would sing "Nigunim"– wordless melodies so powerfully uplifting, they transcend you to another spiritual realm. Our guests would begin to chime in, and our voices became so harmonious even the three tenors would be proud. Then, as if by the blink of your eye, you could suddenly see clearer. You were able to see Shabbat as not just something that religious people observed but rather as how G-d had intended the world to be, with warmth and joy. And as much as you managed to ignore it during the week, it was there for the taking on our seventh day of rest.

Now that I'm grown up, I live in Israel with my husband and child. Since I am a Schwartz at heart, every week 15–20 guests arrive, regardless of the week we've had or the fact that my husband has not sold his dot.com company...yet. Amazingly, somehow we're always prepared, with a little help from above, for our own little paper plate miracle.

A mystic journey into fou Hebrew letters

"...Twenty-two Foundation letters: He engraved them, He carved them...And with them, He depicted all that was formed...And all that would be formed...."
–Sefer Yetzirah, The Book of Formation

"Ot" in Hebrew means a "letter", but it also means a "sigh", a "wonder" and an "omen". Kabbalistic literature stresses the importance of the Hebrew letters, which are considered to be the building blocks of the cosmos, the DNA with which God created the Universe. The Hebrew letters are symbolic representations of 22 distinct archetypal energies whose combinations create all that is, was and will be. These letters are like the energetic primal colors that God uses on the cosmic canvas of life.

Let us take a closer look at the Hebrew word "Olam", which means "world", and see how the letters teach us the message of unity.

ע ו ל ם

The first letter is Ayin "ע" which means an "eye" in Hebrew. The great teacher (Tanna) Shmuel HaKattan tells us that the eye is a replica of the world: The cornea (the white area) corresponds to the ocean; the iris represents the land; the pupil is Jerusalem; and the image of the observer that is reflected in the pupil is the temple. So whenever you are looking into the eye of a fellow human being, your image, reflected in their eyes (Ayin), is the holiest part of their inner being. They say the eyes are the mirrors of the soul. As you look into someone's eyes, you see their soul, lar and divine. According to Sefer Yetzirah, Ayin rules the unicorn, an ancient sign. Of course the word (Olam) is related to Earth.

The value of Ayin in Gematria is 70. Seventy is a holy number. Important discussion is that seventy nations came out of Noah, seventy languages out of the Tower of Babylon, and the Torah was translated into seventy languages. The Maharal in "Gevuros" says that, in the world (Olam) to come, the seventy nations to whom sacrifices were offered in the old Temple will recognize Hashem as the One God of the Olam, the World.

The second letter is Vav "ו". Vav means a nail, that which unites two separate objects and teaches us the lesson of unity. Vav is also used as a prefix of conjunction. We say Ish V'Isha – Man and Woman. Vav is also to unite time! This is called a Converse Vav. Whenever Vav is used as a prefix in the Scriptures, it changes the tense of the verb from past to future and vice versa. For example, the English version of Genesis 1:6 is "And God said...," but in Hebrew it is "VaYomer Elohim". Without the prefix Va, it translates as "He will say" (future), but adding the Vav transforms the meaning into "He said" (past). Vav shows us the timelessness of unity in the world. There are no opposites, no polarities if all is One. Vav is ruled by Taurus, the sign that is said to represent Mother Nature and Earth.

The next letter is Lamed "ל", which is located precisely in the middle of the

BY CORY A. BOOKER

AS AN AFRICAN AMERICAN BAPTIST, WHO ALSO HAPPENS TO BE A COUNCILMAN FOR THE CITY OF NEWARK, NEW JERSEY,

I believe the best way to serve a community, especially one in struggle, is to be available and accessible to the people. So this summer, my team and I have been working to meet the challenges of this city head on, from our mobile home/office frequently found parked on the worst drug corners of our city. We have been holding health clinics, doing AIDS outreach, signing kids up for health insurance, conducting job fairs, registering voters, and pursuing a host of other grassroots initiatives.

Our work has been sobering and difficult. Our hours are long and our small victories often go unrecognized. More than ever, we need our day of rest.

We began our summer journey on May 11, on a notorious drug corner in the north of my district. The street was crowded with residents and activists, almost all of whom were Black and Latino. The one notable exception was a Chasidic Rabbi. W. E. B. Dubois wrote in his 1903 book, Souls of Black Folk, "In a world where it means so much to take a man by the hand and sit beside him, to look frankly in his eyes and feel his heart beating with red blood; in a world where a social cigar or cup of tea together, means more than legislative halls and magazine articles, and speeches, one can imagine the consequences of the almost utter absence of such social amenities between estranged races, whose separation extends even to parks and street cars." This segregation still exists and sadly is an accepted fact of life. But in my inner city reality, the Rabbi is fast becoming an exception to the rule, and his presence in my life has shown me the profound advantages of moving across lines of color, culture and religion. I have a certain Shabbat dinner to thank for that.

In 1992, while studying in Oxford, England, I was invited to share dinner with a friend. Less than a day before the dinner she sent word that I was to meet her at something called the "L'Chaim Society". I went – reluctantly. It was a Friday evening, and I ended up sitting next to a Chassidic rabbi. At first I was stiff and uncomfortable and yearned to leave. But before I knew it, I was engaged in vibrant conversation with the Rabbi. We discussed issues of great meaning to me, issues of judgment, justice, suffering, tolerance, and perseverance in the face of enduring oppression. I was so moved by our discussions and the joy of the evening that I decided to come back to the Rabbi's table the next Friday evening. Soon I became a regular attendee at Shabbat dinners, and the Rabbi and I became the best of friends, freely exchanging the ideas, histories, and intellectual thought of our respective communities.

Two crucial observations struck me most about my new friend. First was his deep abiding desire to bring about what he calls a Messianic Era, what I might call a just universe. He arrived at this imperative through his faith. The second observation gives strength and substance to the first. The Rabbi made space in his incredibly frenetic life, to decelerate and ground himself in the essence of his existence. This was done through Shabbat, where he immersed himself in the slow substance of being and made room to nurture his essential relationships. It was in this religious commandment that the Rabbi was able to reconnect with his foundation and his understanding of his true power and thus become more able to fulfill the profound mission of improving himself and the larger world community.

This has been Rabbi Shmuley Boteach's greatest gift to me: the gift of Shabbat. In my world of screaming imperatives and endless demands, I have learned that an investment in my internal being yields great abundance in my external doing. I believe grasping this understanding is the true challenge before our nation. Can we live up to the potential of that which we have within ourselves? Our nation is yearning for people with the moral strength to act in accordance with their inner convictions, and to live their lives courageously loyal to their core beliefs and values. To be such a person is no easy task, but it is one that we must assume in earnest. Because without a continuous link to one's source, the ability to make the depth of changes our society so desperately needs is seriously undermined. And so, these past six months, in the midst of an exceptionally challenging endeavor and persistent pulls upon my time and person, this Black Christian man has insisted on making time for the observance of Shabbat.

On Freedom

by Shimon Peres

FROM THE DAWN OF OUR LIVES, there are things that exemplify in our minds the shape of the world. The globe, for example, could not be visualized without its five continents. Each of the continents is different in shape, substance and image. And like the continents, so is time, which is divided into seven days. And like the continents, each day has its own character. The first day of the Israeli week, Sunday, signals the beginning of our activities, followed by the next four days of work. Friday is the gateway to the Sabbath, the time for rest and repose.

In a way, the Sabbath is as significant as the discovery of America. The discovery of America, and even more so its Constitution, revealed for the first time a continent devoid of the rule of the church and unfettered by the European traditional establishments. Hence, the amazing thing about America resided in what it prevented, no less than in what it offered. From it emanated a new sense of freedom.

The Sabbath is distinguished by a similar trait. The Sabbath is different from all the other days of the week. It has no routine activities, no work commitments, no interference on the part of the authorities, no evil temptations.

For one day a week, man is totally free. And the meaning of freedom does not fall short of the way it is expressed. Man is on his own – or with whomever he chooses to be with, be it with his G-d or with his family, or his community or himself, alone.

A person is burdened with daily constraints, and occasionally overextends himself. Without the sanction of the Sabbath, it is unlikely that he could have one unfettered day a week, without accountability, without succumbing to the turmoil of everyday living, legitimately indulging in the enjoyment of his own menu – spiritual and culinary.

Indeed, the Sabbath eve prayers "welcome the Queen" – the Queen of rest (the Rambam alludes to the cofrelation between the Hebrew spelling of the word rest [nofesh] and the word soul [nefesh]). Work is forbidden. Labour is forbidden. The taste of another world pervades the life of a person. He is free, and is called upon to accord freedom to everything he possesses, to everyone around him – workers and even slaves.

Nowadays electricity is at our fingertips, and we do not have to toil to make light. And cars are available, and we do not need to harness horses to the cart. Yet the issue is not the effort, even if only partially, but the complete freedom of it. Uncompromising freedom.

The Ten Commandments, comprising less than three hundred and sixty words, serve as the foundation of Western civilization. But the greatness of the Ten Commandments, whether in regard to the "Do's" or "Do Not's," would not have been as salient were it not for the commandment related to the Sabbath.

The Sabbath commandment was the first call to humanity at large for real equality. And the first summons for freeing man from the bondage of man, for freeing man from himself, from the routine of work. This was the first significant taste of freedom and equality. And this taste has never faded since.

> "the Sabbath is as significant as the discovery of America."

YOU HAD ME AT SHALOM

BY DAWNA SHUMAN

The name intrigued me, "OLAM Mystical Wednesdays". I have been looking for "mystical" my whole life.

September 20th, I walk into B'Nai David Judea synagogue on Pico Boulevard – nervous, a bit judgemental, barraged by my "mental committee" in full verbal attack – and enter a room where I am immediately immersed in a soft ambient glow. Lit candles, of all sizes and shapes, everywhere, inviting Moroccan carpets strewn about, exotically lush, pillowy cushions to recline on, tables covered in pastel, silk tapestries.

A Chinese gong sounds; the evening begins.

Rabbi Michael Ozair from OLAM, the cool, charismatic, ex-Dead Head and self-acknowledged Seeker of Truth, leads us into the first exercise....I am captivated. Familiar words connect me to my comfort zone, "Heart Chakra", "feeling the peace within", "letting go of the mental clutter"..."Breathe in".... "breathe out"...On a board, four letters...the "Tetra Grammaton" – the four-letter name of G-d...."breathe in", he encourages...the cosmic seed of creation/the source of light...this special exercise was discovered in a 15th Century Kabbalah manuscript in Italy..."breathe in the essence of G-d...and breathe out"... so much precious information.

In the darkness of my mind, I see whirling, dancing circles of long-bearded, black-cloaked Rebbes, clusters of Mogen Davids and dreidles floating in mid-air, clusters of tiny purple dots of light twinkling in and out...oh, memories of my Jewish background, familiar figures, icons of my youth. I identify the angelic, melodic sounds of a live harpsichord playing as Rabbi Michael gently intones...."breathe in"... I feel so relaxed and dreamy in this new surrounding....

He talks about Rosh Hashannah...a time to recreate anew...an opportunity to redirect our path on Earth while we still have the time. Yom Kippur, a time for at-one-ment...to make amends...cleanse....I soak it all in...for the first time in this Jewish heart, it all makes sense...it resonates so beautifully...and I vibrate deeply in this discovery....I feel like a Jew...

Before Rabbi Michael discusses the Afterlife and spirit guides, we end this meditative session on a "Shalom" chant...slowly. Rabbi Michael, explains that "Shalom" represents the essence of heart and soul. A state of perfect harmony. Always being in Shabbat consciousness. It is also the Name of G-d according to the Zohar, the classical book of Kabbalah. I was expecting the requisite "Om", the primordial sound of the Universe. Then, I realize that "Om" is inherent in "Shalom". I rejoice in my epiphany...links...connections...this is so powerful.....I'm home, I think.....

You had me at Shalom. Shabbat Shalom.

The little Rabbi that could...

Two Hasidim were boasting of the miracles of their respective rabbis. Said one: "My rabbi is a wonder. He can perform miracles like no other. Take this miracle, for instance. It happened once that my rabbi was travelling in a distant town. While he was on the highway a storm suddenly gathered. Lightning flashed, thunder rent the heavens, and the rain came down in torrents. My rabbi stood in danger, G-d forbid, of drowning. Whereupon he performed a miracle. He put forth his hands and, lo! the rain fell to the right of him, and the rain fell to the left of him, but in the middle, where the rabbi was riding, it was perfectly dry."

"Oh, that's nothing," said the other Hasid. "Let me tell you of a miracle that my rabbi performed. It happened once that my rabbi was traveling to a distant town. It was on a Friday, and the rabbi had expected to reach town long before sundown. But the driver had miscalculated the distance, and suddenly the rabbi realized that dusk had fallen and night was quickly coming on. He saw that he was in danger, G-d forbid, of violating the holy Sabbath. Whereupon the rabbi performed a great miracle. He put forth his hands, and, lo! it was Sabbath to the left and to the right, but in the center, where the rabbi was driving, it was the middle of the week."

DID JEW KNOW?

This is an excerpt from the speech of Nicolaus, pleading before the Emperor Agrippa on behalf of the Jews of Ionia, during the Roman Era.

"...And none of our customs are inhuman, but all tend to piety, and are devoted to the preservation of justice; nor do we conceal those injunctions of ours by which we govern our lives, since they are memorials of piety, and are of a friendly conversation among men. And the seventh day we set apart from labor; it is dedicated to the learning of our customs and laws because we think it proper to reflect on them, as well as on any other good thing, in order that we may avoid all sin. If anyone therefore examine into our observances, he will find that they are good in themselves, and that they are also ancient." (Flavius Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, XVI, 2.3)

INTERACTIVE SPIRITUALITY™

Last year OLAM.org gave you the only site on the web that can inspire you in under 10 seconds.

This year, by popular demand, we're adding Interactive Spirituality™. Here's how it works:

Every Monday we post the Question of the Week, a spiritual question that seeks to challenge your mind and move your soul.

Here's what you do: You give us your best response or comments in 100 words or less, and each Friday, we'll post the most interesting and knowledgeable responses.

In the meantime, during the week you get to debate with fellow seekers, compare your responses with others', and spread the Question to all your web buddies. And most important, you get to challenge us with your own Questions. Any questions?

Anti-Israel vote fails at Concordia U.

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For Jewish students at Concordia University, the good news is that a general assembly to vote on an anti-Israel resolution failed to attract a quorum.

The bad news is that the resolution may be put to all of the university's 25,000 students in a referendum.

Last week's assembly, called by the Concordia Student Union (CSU), drew about 450 students – short of the required 526 – to vote on a resolution urging Canada to pressure Israel to implement the 1967 United Nations resolution 242, by cutting diplomatic and economic ties.

The motion, initiated by CSU councillor Stéphane Desautels, is supported by Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) and the Arab and Muslim students associations.

The CSU represents the 21,000 undergraduates. Although officially neutral in the campaign, it strongly urged students to vote, and free food was offered at the assembly.

But Resolution might still be brought forward

Hillel, which represents Concordia's more than 1,000 Jewish students, boycotted both the assembly and the aggressive campaign by the 'yes' forces leading up to the assembly. "Being invited to a general assembly to defend yourself does not constitute open debate," it said in a statement.

About 150 Hillel members, as well as Jewish students from other universities and CEGEPs, held a demonstration in the university lobby outside the hall where the assembly was taking place. Singing peace songs from the '60s and '70s to the beat of a tam-tam, they held signs reading "Keep foreign policy out of our university. You could be the next victim" and "An attack on the Jewish state is an at[illegible]

Occasionally, they loudly chanted "boycott" and "peace on campus."

The goal, said Concordia Hillel president Joshua Margo, was to discourage students from attending the assembly.

At one point, someone yelled back, "If you want peace, don't kill children."

There were a few impromptu arguments on the Middle East and expressions of feeling insulted by each other's rhetoric, but emotions were restrained and the sides generally stayed apart.

The Jewish students refused a request from the dean of students, Donald Boisvert, to hold their demonstration outside, on Mackay

The News in Brief

CANADA

Mosque Bombing

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress has issued a statement of sympathy regarding the recent firebombing of a mosque in Surrey, British Columbia. "It is with sadness," stated CJC Pacific region chair Zena Simces, "that we learned of the damage by fire to the Masjid mosque. This incident is especially painful since it deprived congregants of their place of worship on the eve of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan." CJC national president Moshe Ronen added, "If it is established that the fire was deliberately set, we unequivocally condemn such a grotesque act as an assault on all Canadians. We hope that the authorities will be successful in their efforts to apprehend the perpetrators and proceed against them to the full extent of the law."

Meantime, Muslim leaders are charging that purportedly pro-Israel media coverage of the Mideast crisis may have played a role in the mosque fire.

Zundel Case Resumes

TORONTO — A human rights case involving Nazi apologist and Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel resumed last week – with Zundel not present. Instead, Paul Fromm, a former teacher dismissed for racist associations, addressed the tribunal. Fromm has received intervener status and is supporting Zundel at the hearing. The tribunal is adjudicating a complaint from Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron, who claims Zundel operates a Web site that violates the Canadian Human Rights Act by promoting hatred or contempt for Jews. The case has been before the tribunal on and off for five years but it is expected to wind up sometime this week.

ISRAEL

'Only' Sons Barred?

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Force is reportedly barring soldiers who are the only sons in their families, or are from bereaved families, from serving in combat roles in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The Israeli daily Yediot Achronot reported that the order replaces the previous practice of allowing such soldiers to serve in the territories if they volunteer and their parents sign a consent form.

Promoting Coexistence

JERUSALEM — The Israel Association of Community Centres (IACC) has announced that 2.5 million shekels have been allocated to expand programs on coexistence between Jews and Arabs in Israel. The new funds will subsidize courses in Arabic language and culture at 180 community centres in Israel, 30 of which are in Arab neighbourhoods. The Kahanoff Foundation is contributing half the amount, with the balance coming from the ministry of education and the IACC.

Kahane Convicted

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court has overturned a previous ruling and convicted Binyamin Ze'ev Kahane of incitement to rebellion. Kahane, son of the late, militantly anti-Arab Rabbi Meir Kahane, had been accused of distributing leaflets calling on the army to bomb the Israeli-Arab town of Umm el-Fahm.

WORLD

Dormant Accounts

BERN — Swiss banks plan to publish the names on some 26,000 dormant accounts that are believed to belong to Holocaust victims, the Swiss Bankers Association said last week. The list, to be published early next year, would be the third released by the banks, which have agreed to pay out the funds to the original account holders or their heirs. The banks have already published the names on some 60,000 dormant accounts.

Truth on Wallenberg?

MOSCOW — A Russian commission is convinced that Raoul Wallenberg was shot in a Soviet prison after World War II, and it plans to ask prosecutors to rehabilitate him as a victim of Stalinist repression, according to Russia's Interfax news agency. It has long been suspected that the Soviets killed Wallenberg, a Swedish diplomat credited with saving the lives of some 100,000 Jews in wartime Hungary. The Soviets had long claimed he died of a heart attack in 1947.

ANC's Position

JOHANNESBURG — More South African Jews may leave the country if the governing African National Congress continues to side with the Palestinians in the ongoing Middle East crisis, a Jewish leader warned. "We note that the ANC condemns only Jewish aggression and never PLO aggression. When Israelis are killed the government is silent," Russell Gaddin, national chair of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, said at a recent meeting with an ANC official. Several prominent ANC officials recently made anti-Israel comments.

Cantor Arrested

CHICAGO — Members of Chicago's Jewish community are expressing shock at the arrest of a former cantor and his wife in connection with a prostitution ring. Joel Gordon, 51, who has served at several Chicago-area synagogues, was charged with keeping a house of ill repute.

Anti-Semitic Acts Surge Down Under

SYDNEY — Jewish leaders in Australia are attributing a recent upsurge in anti-Semitic acts to the ongoing crisis in the Middle East.

They say they have received more than 100 reports of anti-Semitic incidents since Oct. 1, shortly after the latest round of Israeli-Palestinian violence began.

More than 50 incidents have occurred in New South Wales, Australia's most populous state. Some of the worst incidents have taken place in Sydney.

The attacks prompted the premier of New South Wales to discuss the issue in Parliament. In his address, Bob Carr described a series of firebombings on Sydney synagogues as "sickening."

He spoke of one synagogue attack in which intruders tied ten prayer shawls together into a wick and lit them with kerosene. As well, there have been three firebomb attacks on the home of Rabbi Pinchus Feldman, the Lubavitch movement's senior rabbi in Sydney.

A special investigative unit has been established to deal with attacks on Jews and Jewish institutions in Sydney's eastern suburbs.

Few surprises as Liberals romp to victory

Neville joins fellow Jewish MPs in Ottawa

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite what Canadian Jewish Congress calls "unprecedented" attempts to draw it into partisan politics, and to use the Jewish community as a political football, there were very few surprises in last week's federal election.

There will be one new Jewish member of Parliament as Jean Chrétien prepares for his third majority: Anita Neville (née Schwartz) won the riding of Winnipeg South Centre, the seat formerly held by Lloyd Axworthy, who retired from politics just before the election.

Neville was the only Jewish candidate for any party in Manitoba. She was a longtime school trustee in Winnipeg and was an unsuccessful Liberal candidate in a previous provincial election.

There will now be six Jewish MPs, all Liberals: In addition to Neville, Irwin Cotler in Mont-Royal, Raymonde Folco and Jacques Saada in Montreal-area ridings, Elinor Caplan in Thornhill, and the veteran Herb Gray in Windsor West. Gray has represented the riding since 1963.

Anita Neville

All of them won convincing victories, as did other other candidates in traditional Liberal strongholds with large numbers of Jewish residents, showing, perhaps, that Jewish voters were not as angry at the government's support for UN Resolution 1322 as had been believed.

According to Canadian Jewish Congress national executive director Jack Silverstone, Canada's support of the UN measure that slammed Israel for employing "excessive" force against Palestinians probably cost the Liberals some Jewish votes.

"But we're also aware that the Canadian representatives have taken important positive initiatives in support of Israel at the UN that have been welcomed by the Israeli government," Silverstone said.

It was perhaps disenchantment with the Liberals arising from the UN vote that sparked the heated, often ugly campaign rhetoric in pursuit of Jewish votes, Silverstone said.

"A great deal of effort was made to draw our community in partisan ways to a degree unprecedented in our experience," he said.

Congress had to "repeatedly" remind candidates that it is non-partisan and does not endorse anyone, Silverstone noted.

"We resisted their aggressive attempts to make a political football out of our community. We have good relations with all the parties and we were not going to be dragged into a partisan debate, despite their most intense efforts."

There were five known Jewish candidates running for the Canadian Alliance, and all made political hay of the UN measure.

At several rallies, the government and Liberal candidates were booed, and Alliance hopefuls cheered as they noted their leader Stockwell Day's support for Israel and condemnation of Canada's vote.

Jewish incumbents, especially Caplan, became lightning rods for Jewish anger at the government. That prompted Chrétien to establish a direct pipeline between Jewish leaders and his office in an effort to prevent future problems. The prime minister also issued an unprecedented statement in which

December means poetry

From the editor's desk

My first thought was to use this space to comment on the results of the recent Canadian elections. However, with one set of elections – our own – completed, another – in the United States – as of this writing thankfully nearing its completion, and a third looming on the spring horizon in Israel, most readers, I suspect, like me, are suffering from election overdose and fatigue.

Moreover, what could I insightfully add to the myriad pages and countless words that have already been written or will be written? Thus, I set politics aside for poetry.

In December, especially, poetry is an appropriate salve and substitute for politics. December means Chanukah. In many homes and schools, since the creation of the State of Israel, Chanukah has been the occasion to recall the heroism and the poetry of Hannah Senesh, the youngster from Kibbutz Sdot Yam who lost her life behind German lines in World War II, trying to rescue fellow Jews. Her exceptionally poignant poem Blessed is the Match (Ashrei Hagafrur) has become something of national anthem-like aesthetic associated with Chanukah.

But it is not Senesh's poetry I bring to the attention of CJN readers. Rather, it is some of the new offerings from Canadian writers and publishers that I highlight at the outset of "poetic December."

Peretz Miransky: selected poems & fables, edited by Anna Miransky, (Mosaic Press Publishers) is an important work. It deserves to be in household and school libraries. The legendary Miransky, who died in 1993, was known throughout the Yiddish-speaking world as one of this century's most incisive, most expressive poets. This elegant collection offers some 40 poems both in the original Yiddish and on facing pages, their English translations. Thus, in addition to providing the beauty of the poems themselves, the book is also a language-lab for aspiring young Yiddish readers.

Poets
by Peretz Miransky

To whom do the poets sing/ in a world of anger and fear?/ they sing from parapets unbowed,/ bathed in their own salty tears.

Where do they find the perfect word/ when their language fades and dies?/ In memories of yesterday,/ in their mothers' lullabies.

And who will inherit their poetry/ in yellowing autumn's dying glow?/ Perhaps the wind, which threshes the chaff,/ the golden kernels to resow.

Light Industry, (Mosaic Press Publishers), is the latest collection by renowned poet Seymour Mayne. The veteran award-winning Ottawa writer has written, edited or translated more than 40 works. As the title suggests, Light Industry, is an anthology of some 50 humourous, satirical, "non-serious" offerings.

Velcro by Seymour Mayne

The pleasing velcro/ of my cat's tongue/ grazes my hand/ in interspecies/ covenant.

She nudges the palm/ that will feed her/ and unhumanlike/ harbours/ no ingratitude.

She is all/ expressive/of simple need/ and since I am not mouse-size

I don't have to be furtive/ in my ways./ Shrink me, however,/ and I'm/ a sure goner.

Parchment is an independent journal of contemporary Canadian writing. Located at the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, it appears annually. Its editor, Adam Fuerstenberg, pours great love into his selections of prose, poetry, drama, essay and interview. The resulting work is a pleasing and provocative collection of fine writing. Because it provides a high quality vehicle for Jewish creative writing in Canada by young and old, it should be supported by all readers for whom creative writing is important. Many of its contributors have also appeared in The CJN,

JACS chapter opens for alcoholics, drug addicts

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "I want everyone to have a good look at me, a real good look at me," insisted the speaker.

At times the composure of the poised woman in the stylish black suit threatened to crumple, but she told her story straight through, with a quiet dignity punctuated only by her occasional wiping away of tears.

"My name's Marla, and I'm an alcoholic and an addict," she said.

Marla Goldman was speaking at the inaugural educational meeting of the Toronto chapter of JACS (Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others), held on a recent evening at Associated Hebrew Schools' Thornhill branch. (Audio tapes of the meeting are available for purchase.)

"Our mission is to educate and enlighten the Jewish community that we have a silent sickness that no one is willing to acknowledge," said Jack Wachtel, co-chair of JACS with Neville Smith, the driving force behind the local branch, which is a program of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS). There are two other Canadian chapters of which Smith is aware, in Ottawa and Montreal.

"Recovery is possible," Wachtel stressed. Too many people use words like "morally weak," he said. "Addiction is a disease." It affects more people in Canada than cancer, arthritis and diabetes combined, he noted.

Goldman – who, like the other JACS volunteers quoted, chose to have her surname used in this article – will celebrate eight years of sobriety next May, she said.

Her announcement was applauded by an audience of over 150 men and women ranging from young adults to seniors, including her fiancé and family members.

"I have buried many friends," Goldman said, "and I often ask myself, 'Why is God giving me this chance to stand in front of you?'" She believes the answer lies in helping others as she has been helped.

"Call the phone lines and ask for Marla," she said, referring to JACS' 24-hour hotline (416-410-JACS).

The establishment of a resource centre, JACS' Place, on Sheppard Ave. W., was also announced at the meeting. Other JACS' services include community outreach and a network for teens with addicted family members.

Charles Asch, 32, heads up JACS' speaker board, and has already told his own story to groups of adolescents. Now in recovery for five years, he began using drugs before he was in high school. "I wanted to belong, and be the same as everybody else – and feel that way," he said.

Now, he says, he accepts responsibility for his choices and strongly credits 12-step programs in his recovery.

> Numbers are 'staggering'

A third speaker, who requested anonymity, was a family member of an addict.

JACS is "not a treatment program, but it assists and encourages people to find the help they need," said Smith. JACS is geared to Jews of any, or no, denominational background.

The only daughter in a loving, traditional Jewish home, Goldman said she "shut totally down" at age 13. Her voice quavered as she recalled being sexually abused from the age of 10. Her abuser had told her her father would die if she spoke of the abuse.

Drinking numbed her pain and made her feel "like everybody else, and that's all I wanted in my life."

Her disease escalated, encompassing drugs as well as alcohol. She married, had three children, and left her husband before turning to JF&CS when she feared she had come too close to hurting her children.

Eventually she entered a rehabilitation program. "You have shown great courage in entering this program," her brother wrote at the time, on behalf of himself and Goldman's other brother.

With subsequent therapy and 12-step programs, Goldman learned to deal with the normal ups and downs of life.

"Today I'm a changed person," she said. "I have a fabulous relationship with my children… they have their mother back."

Through her involvement with JACS, she hopes to regain some of the Jewishness she rejected.

In a question-and-answer session, Goldman noted that nobody can really help an addict until they are ready. "The best thing we can do is to help the family, so the family knows how to deal with this person. Sometimes we… let the person know that if they take our hand we'll take them to the meeting."

There could be as many as 20,000 Jewish addicts and alcoholics in Toronto, based on a New York study indicating the incidence of addiction in the Jewish population at 12 percent, the same as in the general population, said Smith.

When you include family, friends and business associates of addicts, he noted, the numbers are "staggering."

CORRECTION

In the article "Empowered women can accomplish much: Eisen" (CJN, Nov. 30), Wendy Eisen was misquoted. The sentence should have read: "We helped pave the way for the largest aliyah movement in history: one million people from the former Soviet Union have come to Israel." In addition, the correct title of her book is Count Us In. The CJN regrets the errors.

JF & CS needs kids' winter clothes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "We need children's winter clothes – desperately. For some reason there seems to be more of a shortage now than there ever has been," says Andrea Pines of Jewish Family and Child Service.

As JF&CS's co-ordinator of volunteer services, Pines oversees Just A Second, the Bathurst Street shop selling used clothing and household items. Among Just A Second's customers are approximately 2,500 JF&CS clients on financial assistance, who shop for free at the store. JIAS clients have a similar arrangement.

But last week, the selection of children's clothing at Just A Second was meagre.

"We have some sweatshirts, a few coats – which are not in excellent condition, three or four snowsuits for babies, and maybe two or three coats in sizes 7 and 8. We are very short on boys' stuff," says Klara Ifrah, the store's manager.

Recent donations have included almost no children's winter coats or snowsuits in wearable condition, she notes. Sweaters, sweatshirts, hats, gloves, boots and boys' pants for infants to teens are also needed.

Over 150 people a day shop at the store, about one third of whom are JF&CS and JIAS clients, says Ifrah.

After seven years at the store, Ifrah notes that the quality and quantity of donated clothes are not what they used to be.

Torn, dirty or smelly clothing is recycled instead of being sold, she says. Out-of-season clothes are stored until the appropriate time of year.

Sometimes people see bags full of donations and assume the store has enough, Ifrah says. "Unfortunately we don't get exactly what we need."

Donations are accepted at the yellow JF&CS clothing boxes any time, or at the store, 4117 Bathurst St. at York Downs Avenue, after 10 a.m., Sunday through Thursday. No appointment is necessary. Store hours are 11 a.m. to 6 p.m., Monday to Thursday; 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. on Sunday.

Clothing boxes are located at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Bathurst Street and Hillmount Avenue, the Thornhill branch of Associated Hebrew Schools, 300 Atkinson Ave., the Bathurst Jewish Centre at 4588 Bathurst St. and outside the Just A Second shop.

It's horah night in Canada as nuptials draw 2,000

New bride Chanie Hildeshaim celebrates following ceremony. [Ron Csillag photos]

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The klezmer band was on the home team bench. Bars serving schnapps were on the goal lines. The mechitzah cut right down centre ice.

The cavernous Air Canada Centre, with hockey banners hanging from the ceiling and Toronto Maple Leafs and Raptors logos everywhere, may have been an unlikely venue for a Jewish wedding.

But these were no ordinary nuptials. Guests surveyed the scene from the choice platinum seats, and children vied over who would sit in the penalty box.

Last week's marriage between Chanie Zaltzman and Chaim Leib Hildeshaim may well have been the best-attended Jewish wedding in recent memory. Some 2,000 invited guests were on hand at the ACC for the affair that wed Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman's daughter with the scion of a well-known rabbinic family in Brooklyn's Crown Heights neighbourhood.

The bride, 20, is the eldest of Rabbi Zaltzman's 13 children. He has been spiritual leader of Toronto's large and growing Russian and ex-Soviet Jewish community for going on 20 years.

The crowd could have been even bigger: Rabbi Zaltzman, executive director of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, said he sent out over 8,000 invitations to the city's Russian-Jewish population alone.

Joining the festivities were newly-elected Liberal MPs Art Eggleton and Elinor Caplan, and Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter.

The day was auspicious for another reason: It was the 21st wedding anniversary of Rabbi Zaltzman and his wife Chiena.

The atmosphere on the ACC's covered ice was muted at first, as guests helped themselves to Russian-style spicy eggplant and thick-cut beets. But when the bride and groom entered in separate processions, the place erupted into joyous wedding horas and traditional chassidic merriment.

The festivities took place at the Air Canada Centre.

Preceding all the fun, however, was a solemn ceremony that itself was preceded by the kabalat panim and bedeking ceremonies, the former involving separate receptions for the bride and groom, who had not seen each other for a week, and the latter in which the groom veils his bride's face to remind her of the Jewish ideal of modesty.

The chuppah was erected outside the arena, under an open sky, as prescribed by Jewish tradition. A few hundred braved the icy wind as the rest of the guests watched the proceedings on the Jumbotron indoors.

In candle-lit processions, the groom, 24, was escorted to the chuppah by his father and father-in-law. The groom stood in silent prayer until his veiled bride arrived on the arms of her mother and mother-in-law.

The bride and groom are distantly related: the groom's grandmother and Rabbi Zaltzman's mother were first cousins.

A letter from the Lubavitcher Rebbe was read aloud and the traditional ceremony was conducted, concluded by the reciting of the Sheva Brachot, the seven blessings.

The party broke up early, but continued into the small hours at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue in Thornhill.

"It was beautiful, just beautiful," sighed a tired but happy Rabbi Zaltzman the next day. "We give thanks to Hashem for this day."

The couple will spend the next year in Brooklyn, where the groom, a rabbi, will continue his studies at a kolel.

The bride and groom under the chuppah.

Be exemplars of our highest values

With the ballots cast, votes counted and the results tabulated, the Canadian federal election of Nov. 27, 2000 is over. Accounting for the daily fare of election speculation that dominated the news immediately after the Alliance Party's leadership convention in the summer, the election campaign was, in truth, a great deal longer than 37 days. There is therefore, no need to prolong the election discussion. That task now falls to the historians.

But there is a need to start a new discussion about some of the significant challenges facing the newly elected Parliament.

The first challenge facing the new government, indeed all governments, is to strive to implement the soundest, most appropriate substantive policies on the broad range of issues that demand legislative attention. Of course, there is never perfect knowledge of, nor a perfect solution to, the question of what precisely is "the soundest, most appropriate" policy. There are at least as many different philosophical/ideological approaches to the issues confronting us as there are political parties.

This brings us, therefore, to the second challenge facing the new government. The formulation of policy, the exchange of ideas, the debate in the Commons, the public "dialogue," as it were, must be reexamined. We must indeed achieve the soundest, most appropriate policies but in a manner that abates the cynicism that is increasingly taking hold within the public, and especially the younger public, toward public service, in general, and our politicians, in particular, whose behaviour so often seems incongruous with the importance of their work.

Cynicism breeds disrespect. Disrespect breeds indifference. Indifference is poison to the life-force that is so indispensable to democracy and its institutions, namely, a belief that public service matters and that informed involvement by the electorate is vital to achieving the highest common good.

To all the individuals who offered themselves as candidates in the last election, we convey our thanks. To the winners, we convey our congratulations. It is to them we now look to be the exemplars of the highest values that we wish to see embodied in our democratic institutions and to root out, as far as they can, the public behaviour that gives rise to cynicism.

The most treasured virtue of our democracy – all democracies – is not in the final result of an election but in the dignity, fairness and respect for the process that characterizes it between and during elections.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Israel is waiting for you

Israel is the heartbeat of Jewish life, and now is the time to maintain its strength by visiting the only country outside Canada we can call home. The Israeli economy is suffering a severe blow from the drastic decline in tourist traffic. Tourist industry losses could amount to $1 billion this year. If we as a Jewish community do not play a strong role in easing this difficult situation, who will?

Now is the time to demonstrate our partnership with the people of Israel when partnership means so much. Now is the time to show how much we care by filling the streets of ancient Jerusalem, touring Tel Aviv, scaling the heights of Haifa, floating atop the Dead Sea and absorbing the sunshine of Eilat's limitless beaches. Now is the time to take advantage of convenient flights and great rates both in the air and on the ground at Israel's many excellent hotels. You will be in good hands, enjoying the warm hospitality and endless friendship of Israel.

But visiting Israel is not just an act of solidarity. Israel is spirituality, adventure, relaxation, family fun, food for every taste, Middle Eastern open-air markets and specialty shopping. Most of all, Israel is where our history is stored and restored. Israel is where everything seems familiar. Israel is where the Jewish heart beats. It is home.

For more information on the best way to visit Israel now, please call your travel agent or the Israel Government Tourist Office at 416-964-3784.

Winnipeg's true goal

We were most appreciative of your article regarding the Winnipeg Combined Jewish Appeal Campaign ("Winnipeg CJA Campaign Off to a Fast Start," Sept. 28). We are very proud of the sense of family in our community and our embrace of the notion of collective responsibility. Therefore, we would like to correct one figure quoted in the article.

Our goal for this year's campaign is $3,535,000 (not $3,353,000 as written). This goal follows our last year's campaign of $3,420,000, and two years ago of just over $3 million. Our goal is to raise at least $4 million by 2002.

Our success is testament to the vision of our federation/CJA leadership, to our outstanding corps of volunteers, and most importantly, to the broad base of support we receive from the community. Winnipeg Jews have a particular ability to look beyond the statistics, the number of donors, percentage increase, etc., and right to the real people whose lives are impacted by our support.

Finally, we recently enjoyed the "nachas" of being honoured with the Pinchas Sapir Award at the General Assembly in Chicago, for excellence in campaign results and initiatives – Winnipeg is truly a "kehillah with character!"

Peace Now should reconsider

The Canadian Friends of Peace Now must be desperate to have inserted a full-page ad in The CJN (Oct. 26) listing a number of their activities during these past weeks of crisis. It obviously feels the need to restore its credibility, which has been justifiably questioned by Jews across the political spectrum.

The very first sentence of the ad tells us that "Peace Now recognizes the right of any Jew to visit the Temple Mount." But by also calling Ariel Sharon's visit "irresponsible and provocative," Peace Now serves as a mouthpiece for Palestinian propaganda in justifying its countrywide riots and uprisings.

The ad "condemned [Yasser] Arafat for not restraining the protesters, Tanzim militias and the Palestinian police from engaging in violence." In that statement however, Peace Now deflects blame from Arafat for actually planning and starting the violence as a tactic to force Israel into further concessions. The violence has nothing to do with "Palestinian frustration and rage," as the media like to put it.

The ad also tells us that "a Peace Now delegation, including Israeli authors Amos Oz and A.B.Yehoshua, visits bereaved Arab-Israeli families in Nazareth and the Galilee." That, of course, is commendable. But has the Peace Now delegation also visited the families of the Israeli soldiers lynched in Ramallah?

However noble Peace Now's purpose, the real issue is that its policy vis-a-vis the peace process has been a failure. The Oslo accords and their implementation and the consistent appeasement of Arafat have been nothing short of a disaster. It should be clear by now that for Arafat, the peace process is a war process, and that he is not a partner for peace and never has been. Instead of re-examining its position, Peace Now intends to carry on business as usual as though nothing has changed.

Only world Jewry can stop Israel

The recent condemnations by the most respected international human rights organizations, Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International and the UN Commission, of the excessive forces deployed by Israel, I feel demonstrates the threat to the security not just to all peoples living in the region but to the world and to world Jewry...

We must stop Israel from becoming even more aggressive! Only world Jewry is in the position to do this. The destruction of Israel, not to mention a worldwide revulsion against Jews is a serious threat. We must take action with tolerance, love and magnanimity... the situation is quickly getting out of control.

Perspectives

A return to first principles

By DAVID H. GOLDBERG

The first casualty of war is often the truth. This axiom is manifested in the war currently being waged against Israel by the Palestinians. The battle on the ground is accompanied by a well-orchestrated campaign of lies, half-truths and distortions, all designed to isolate, discredit and delegitimize Israel. The purpose of this article is to provide a partial corrective to this unjust situation, by emphasizing several basic facts about Israel's political history.

A Permanent Jewish Presence

Even during centuries of exile, there always was a Jewish presence in Eretz Israel. Most Jews congregated in Jerusalem's Old City, close to the Western Wall, but communities also existed in Safed, Hebron, Nablus and elsewhere. The point is that, contrary to Arab claims, the Jews are not foreign interlopers but rather part of the permanent landscape of historic Palestine.

The 'Twice Promised Land'?

On November 2, 1917, Arthur Balfour, the British foreign secretary, expressed the British government's support for the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people.

The Balfour Declaration accorded the Zionist movement vital international legitimacy. It was incorporated in the League of Nations Mandate (1920) which gave Great Britain administrative responsibility over areas of Palestine on both sides of the Jordan River.

Arab leaders complained that the Balfour Declaration contradicted political commitments made in the First World War to Sharif Hussein to encourage an Arab revolt against the Ottoman empire. The Arabs and their supporters accused the British of duplicity.

In 1922, Britain arbitrarily split the Palestine Mandate in two, handing the far larger part east of the Jordan River to Emir Abdullah, who established Transjordan and prohibited Jewish immigration and land purchases.

Many Israelis still charge that it was the Jews, not the Arabs, who were the actual victims of British duplicity!

Partition, War and Refugees

On November 29, 1947, the UN General Assembly adopted Resolution 181, which called for the partition of Palestine into separate Arab and Jewish states. The Jews accepted the partition plan but the local Arab leadership and the Arab League rejected it unconditionally.

A terrorist campaign against Jewish outposts was waged by Arab irregular forces. On May 14, 1948, Israel proclaimed statehood. Within hours, it was invaded by the armies of Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon, Syria and Iraq.

During the 1948-49 war, some 600,000 Palestinian Arabs were displaced – some left of their own volition or on the orders of their military commanders, others left out of fear of reprisals for attacks on Jews. A roughly equivalent number of Jews were forced by anti-Israel rioting to flee Arab and Muslim lands. The vast majority migrated to Israel and were immediately absorbed by the state.

By contrast, most of the displaced Palestinians were denied citizenship and basic rights by the neighbouring Arab countries, who preferred to use the refugee issue as a political weapon against Israel. Many of them and their descendants continue to live in squalid refugee camps.

The Palestinian demand for a "right of return" of the refugees to pre-state Israel is rejected by Israel on political, legal and moral grounds: politically, because their repatriation would destroy Israel by undermining its Jewish character; legally, because the "right of return" does not exist in international law (it being the exclusive prerogative of a sovereign state to determine whom it will admit); and morally, because Israel cannot be expected to find a solution to a problem for which it was not responsible.

Israel will contribute to international projects to address the Palestinian refugee issue. But it cannot be blamed for a problem that resulted directly from the Arab world's fateful decision to wage war against Israel in 1948-49.

1967: War and Land-for-Peace

In the spring of 1967, the Arab world prepared for war again. Egypt evicted UN peacekeepers from the Sinai Desert, remilitarized the border region and closed the Straits of Tiran to Israeli shipping. Syria fired on Israel from the Golan Heights. And Jordan entered a joint defence pact with Egypt and Syria.

David Ben-Gurion declares the creation of the State of Israel.

Considering these actions to be casus belli, Israel launched a pre-emptive strike on June 5th. Within six days Israel held the Sinai, Gaza Strip, West Bank, east Jerusalem, and Golan Heights.

While taking steps to consolidate its position, Israel declared its readiness to exchange some of those areas for peace. The Arab League responded with the "three nos" adopted at its Khartoum summit September 1, 1967: no peace, no recognition, no negotiation with Israel.

On November 22, 1967, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 242. At its essence it recommended that in return for comprehensive peace – defined as the end of all forms of belligerency against it and respect for and acknowledgement of its territorial integrity and right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries – Israel should withdraw from territories (but not all the territories) occupied in 1967.

It was on the basis of this land-for-peace formula (reinforced by the Security Council Resolution 338 of October 1973) that prime minister Menachem Begin and Egypt's president Anwar Sadat negotiated the return of the Sinai in exchange for Israel's historic first peace treaty with an Arab country. And it was on the basis of this formula that Israel approached all subsequent peace negotiations.

Unfortunately, the Arabs often work from a competing – inaccurate – interpretation of Resolution 242, one premised on Israel's complete withdrawal from all lands held since 1967 in exchange for more limited conceptions of peace (ie., "non-belligerency").

The historical record demonstrates that the land-for-peace formula, implemented in its purest form, is the only viable approach to Arab-Israeli peacemaking.

Jewish Settlements

The Jewish right to reside in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is based on a blend of religious, historical, strategic, demographic and legal considerations.

Religiously, there was a Jewish presence at holy sites in the territories (e.g., the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron and Joseph's Tomb in Nablus) even during centuries of dispersion.

Historically, a large number of Jewish communities existed in the West Bank prior to the 1948 War; all were evacuated or destroyed in the course of hostilities.

From 1948 to 1967, Jews were prohibited from residing in the Egyptian-controlled Gaza or the Jordanian-occupied West Bank and east Jerusalem. Following the 1967 war, Israeli military experts viewed strategically situated settlements as "trip wires" against renewed Arab hostility and as a security perimeter around Jerusalem.

Though the dynamic of regional security has changed significantly in the intervening years, many of these settlements continue to have a vital strategic function.

Demographically, since 1967, the Jewish population in the territories has expanded to some 170,000 residents in 145 settlements. The reality is that it is now impossible for any Israeli government, even if it were so inclined, to evacuate all settlers from the territories.

Legally, the sovereignty of the West Bank and Gaza remains unclear. From 1920 to 1948, the areas fell under the administration of the League of Nations Mandate, which encouraged Jewish settlement throughout the country. However, the termination of the Mandate in May 1948 left the areas in a legalistic limbo.

Israeli sovereignty was applied to areas under Jewish control at the end of the 1948-1949 war. However, no legal regime was ever instituted in Arab-controlled areas to replace mandatory law, leading the international legal authority, Eugene Rostow, to conclude that the Jewish right of settlement in these areas is "equivalent in every way to the right of the local population there."

According to the Oslo accords, settlements were not to be discussed until the permanent status negotiations; there was no prohibition on settlement activity.

At last summer's Camp David summit, there was reportedly a general understanding in favour of Prime Minister Ehud Barak's idea of adjusting the "green line" to incorporate, under Israeli sovereignty, three large settlement blocs incorporating the overwhelming majority of settlers in a permanent peace settlement. The status of this understanding is uncertain given the ongoing Palestinian violence.

Jerusalem

At Camp David, Barak proposed transferring control of some parts of east Jerusalem to the Palestinians. This proposal was rejected by Yasser Arafat, who demanded Palestinian/Islamic sovereign control over the Old City as well, including the Temple Mount.

This Barak could not abide. The Jewish connection to Jerusalem is more than 3,000 years old, dating from King David's decision to make Jerusalem the political capital of the Jewish nation. Even during centuries of exile, Jews managed to maintain not only a spiritual but a physical attachment to Jerusalem.

By the middle of the 19th century Jews constituted a majority of the city's population. The November 1947 UN Partition Plan called for Jerusalem to be "internationalized."

However, at the end of the 1948-49 war, the city was divided for the first time in its history. Jordan prevented Jews from praying at their holy places in the Old City, including the Western Wall. Synagogues and cemeteries were desecrated and destroyed.

Jerusalem was reunified in the 1967 war, and the reunified city was declared "the eternal capital of the Jewish state." At the same time, steps were taken to safeguard the rights of all Jerusalem's citizens, including free access to the holy places of all faiths, including the Al-Aksa Mosque.

In the Oslo accords, discussions about Jerusalem were deferred until permanent status negotiations. The build-up to the current violence witnessed a concerted Palestinian campaign to minimize Jewish claims to Jerusalem, and it is no coincidence that organizers are describing the situation as the "Al-Aksa intifada."

While open to various ideas, Israel has rejected as impractical and a fundamental inversion of history any proposal denying Israel sovereign control over the Old City.

Supersol, a correction

Some months ago, I wrote an article about Charles Bronfman and mentioned that he and Ray Wolfe were responsible for the creation of Supersol, Israel's supermarket chain. Subsequently, a correction was written by Naomi Loeb, who wrote that it was her father Bertram who was the founder of Supersol. In fact, I received a long letter from Bertram Loeb in which he detailed some of the events that led to the founding of this store. In fairness to him and his family, I quote from his letter:

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In 1956, Bertram Loeb had a conversation with the then Israeli prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, who asked him what he did in Canada. Loeb answered that he operated a chain of supermarkets.

Ben-Gurion replied: "Then, why don't you come here and open supermarkets?"

Loeb replied that he would think about it.

Ben-Gurion then said in a demanding tone: "Don't think about it – just do it!"

In response, Loeb made preparations to establish a supermarket in Israel, but there was a considerable amount of local opposition. Existing stores feared that their business would be interfered with. Some suppliers refused to service a supermarket. Loeb also had to convince the rabbinate that kashrut would be strictly observed. But that was only part of the problem.

"Getting a supermarket built and equipped was a nightmare," Loeb writes in his letter. "Corruption in the business trades was rampant. A man's word meant nothing. Our game plan, designed so that everything would come together logically and we could anticipate a completion and opening date, could not be realized. But we persisted, and I had to fly there almost monthly for most of the year. It seemed that everyone was against us except the housewives.

"In 1959, when the success of the first two stores was assured, we decided to go public in order to finance the expansion. I met with Charles Bronfman and he agreed to serve as chair of the company. His name and association with Supersol attracted investors and he became actively involved. Ray Wolfe joined the board a year later, followed by Leon Weinstein and Mark Levy. Lawrence Freiman had been a board member since the inception and a preponderance of Canadian board members gave the company a distinctive Canadian flavour.

"Charles Bronfman took his office seriously and rendered far more than lip service. In 1964, when the company experienced serious difficulties due to financial mismanagement by Israeli senior staff, Charles sent a group of Montreal consultants and auditors who eventually got the company back on track. He played an integral part in the growth and development of Supersol, but he was spared the 'pangs of birth,' and I was happy to have him associated with us."

I am glad to set the record straight. Loeb started Supersol, but Bronfman and Wolfe had a large part in its success.

The settlement dilemma

The confrontation with the Palestinians has its own dynamic and impact on Israeli public opinion. Attitudes towards the Palestinians have hardened across the spectrum, but the virtual impossibility of a military victory in the current conflict is also penetrating the Israeli public. At the same time, the fate of the settlements is re-emerging as a significant issue in the debate.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

In the '80s, especially in light of the Likud government's deliberate settlement policy in the heartland of Samaria and Gaza, the settlements were a central bone of contention dividing the Israeli right and left. All acknowledged that the Labour governments of the '70s had encouraged the string of security settlements along the Jordan Valley, and that they had also given in to extreme groups who settled in areas heavily populated by Palestinians. However, Labour opposed the patchwork settlement policy that deliberately sought to ensure an Israeli presence throughout the West Bank and along the Gaza strip.

The 1995 Beilin-Abu Mazen agreement set a precedent by proposing to maintain 80 percent of the settlements in place in a negotiated agreement, but referred to the evacuation of settlements not included in those major clusters.

Yitzhak Rabin's assassination in November 1995 and the subsequent mutual recriminations between the Israeli left and right abruptly ended the debate over the settlements. In an effort to reach a consensus and to unite the people behind the peace process, Shimon Peres and Yossi Beilin, the architects of Oslo, reached out to the National Religious Party (NRP), most closely identified with the settlement movement. Rather than considering evacuation of the settlements, Peres' position changed to one of keeping the vast majority of settlements in place, even if in some cases this would leave them under Palestinian control. The NRP, in turn, which had already been forced to acknowledge the limited public support for the settlement in the heartland of Judea and Samaria, was prepared to move from demanding Israeli sovereignty over the territory to leaving the settlements in place, even under Palestinian control in isolated cases.

Ehud Barak came to office claiming to be "everyone's" prime minister, and unlike his predecessor Rabin, Barak determined not to alienate the settler movement. As a result, by the time he went to Camp David and put his final offer to Arafat on the table, Barak spoke of three main blocs of settlement that would remain under Israeli control, while the remainder would remain under Palestinian control if their residents preferred to stay. In other words, Barak did not discuss the evacuation of the Israelis living in the heart of Hebron, or in Kfar Darom or Netzarim in Gaza.

The latest "Al-Aksa" intifadah can be more aptly described as the "settlement" intifadah. As the attacks on small clusters of settlers in isolated areas have intensified and the number of soldiers defending them has increased, the question of their fate, and the attendant cost of maintaining their security, has risen to the surface again. Everyone recognizes that as long as they are there, the settlers deserve to be protected. But the cost of that enterprise is being questioned in a new way.

Israel's tabloid dailies, a sure barometer of public opinion, are now including questions about the settlements in their weekly polls. And the results are revealing: Israelis are split, virtually down the middle, on the importance of the settlements as a security buffer, on their negative impact on negotiations with the Palestinians, and on the question of their evacuation as part of an agreement. A small majority support immediate evacuation of children from the isolated settlements.

Israel's Lebanese experience may be a relevant precedent. In the space of four years, a consensus on the need to remain in Lebanon to protect the security of Israel's northern settlements became a consensus on the need to leave Lebanon. Two central factors influenced this shift – a growing number of casualties, and a grassroots movement of mothers of soldiers, who marshalled public opinion against the cost in soldiers' lives. It may take less time, and no more than another "four mothers" to slowly sway public opinion on the settlements even further than it is today.

One person's miscast vote

Jean Chrétien's Liberals have done what most pundits thought impossible. They won a third term as government with an increased majority. But the Liberals know full well that they must temper their joy with some sober realism.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

I know very few people who voted Liberal with any enthusiasm. In fact, many Canadians showed their displeasure by not voting; the turnout was the lowest in 100 years. My own polling station was almost empty at 8 p.m., when I voted.

I did not like any of my options this election. One choice was to hold my nose and vote Liberal. After all, it would send a clear message to the Bloc and their allies, the Parti Québécois. It would support the federalist cause. In my riding of NDG-Lachine, in Montreal, my vote was irrelevant anyway. The Liberals would win by a wide margin. And I actually liked many Liberal politicians, advisers, and the Liberal approach to economic policy.

Why not support the Liberals as I had so often in the past? For one, I thought it was time for the prime minister to step aside in favour of Paul Martin. If and when another Quebec referendum takes place, Paul Martin as prime minister might be worth a few points. Moreover, a minority government might help the Liberals avoid the pitfalls of arrogance and the abuse of power.

Finally, I was dismayed by the government's anti-Israel votes in the UN. The prime minister's so-called apology was simply an expression of regret that the vote caused the Jewish community some distress; he did not repudiate the substance of the vote. But I could vote Liberal and know the sky would not fall.

What were my other options? While I do not believe that Stockwell Day and the Alliance leadership are in any way racist or anti-Semitic, I could not bring myself to vote for a party which many on the extreme right found attractive. I find the basic principles of the modern welfare state, including the health-care system, to my liking. Also, the Stockster needs a bit more seasoning before prime time. I want to be clear. Day's religious convictions play no role here, as they should not for a Joe Lieberman in the United States.

I could park my vote this election, with either the NDP or the PCs. After all, I had once voted, even canvassed, for the NDP, though not in Quebec. I wish they had a more effective leader; I can remember the feisty David Lewis. And while I had never cast a vote for the Conservatives, Joe Clark had run an energetic campaign. To be sure, I suspect neither of these options would be better on Middle Eastern policy, if push came to shove, than the Liberals. They remained possibilities.

The Bloc, of course, was out of the question. I was angry at the Green party because of the Nader effect down south, draining votes away from Al Gore. Why not a real protest vote? The Marijuana party (MP) looked really enticing. Years ago I had in fact cast a vote for the Rhino party; I have never regretted that. Alas the MP took itself far too seriously, and deep down I am probably opposed to legalizing pot-smoking (though I would never arrest anyone who did.)

One option was to spoil my ballot. I could write in Al Gore. As of this writing, he needs every vote he can get, though it may all be too late. Or I could scrawl "None of the Above." Or write some curse words in Hebrew.

A final option was simply to stay home. There was a Canadiens game on TV, they were playing the Thrashers, and they might even win! (In fact they did.) But I could not set a bad example for my 18-year-old son, who was about to cast his very first ballot. What kind of a father would I be?

I walked into the voting booth and studied the list before me. Luckily there was no lineup to hurry me along. I weighed the options carefully, probably more deliberately than for any vote I can remember casting. Which was silly, since my vote would have absolutely no impact on the election outcome.

Anyway, I made up my mind. I took the pencil and confidently wrote my X beside… Sorry, ballots are supposed to be secret, especially for an occasional CJN columnist. Maybe another time.

The Kirshner File

A South African freedom fighter looks back

The morning of April 7, 1988, is indelibly etched into Albie Sachs' consciousness. As he opened the trunk of his car before setting off for his usual jog along a sandy stretch of beach in Maputo, Mozambique, a fiery explosion sent Sachs reeling, plunging him into darkness.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

An alert photographer who happened to be there captured the horrific scene for eternity. Newspapers around the globe, including Canada, carried a graphic photograph on their front page showing the blackened, pathetic hulk of a man flailing around in abject agony.

Sachs lost his right arm and the sight of his left eye in that blast. He spent months in hospitals and rehabilitation centres in Maputo and in London, England, recuperating from his dreadful wounds.

Sachs was a South African citizen in exile, a member of the banned African National Congress (ANC) and a colleague of its incarcerated president, Nelson Mandela, when he was almost blown to bits. Having been branded a "race traitor," he was targeted for assassination by South Africa's security forces, which had launched a campaign to eliminate adversaries of apartheid, the system of institutional segregation.

"I knew I was vulnerable, living in Mozambique, not far from the South African border," he said during a brief visit to Toronto. "But I naively thought that since I wasn't involved in underground or military work, I would not be a target."

Now a justice on South Africa's Constitutional Court, Sachs was on the ANC's constitutional committee and its national executive when he was car-bombed. "I was helping to plan for the new constitutional order in South Africa," said Sachs, a lawyer who was then director of research of Mozambique's Ministry of Justice. "Apartheid was in its last throes, and I was a soft target."

The scion of Lithuanian Jewish immigrants who immigrated to South Africa in the early 1900s, he was in Toronto to discuss his book, The Soft Vengeance of a Freedom Fighter (University of California Press), the revised edition of which was printed recently. Originally published in 1990, it is an account of his gradual recovery, his triumphant re-entry into the world, his burning commitment to social justice and his pivotal role in South Africa since the collapse of apartheid.

Sachs, 65, was up and running as a jogger within a year of the bombing. "I am in excellent health," he said. "I just have to watch my cholesterol, like everyone else."

Tall and slim, with pale skin, he professes to have no difficulty functioning despite the terrible physical price exacted on him. "It's important for me to accept myself as I am," said Sachs, who threw away his prosthesis as he was convalescing. "I have joined the great democracy of the disabled."

A person guided by lofty ideals, he does not consider himself a hero, and rejects that appellation as an imposition. Neither, surprisingly, is he bitter or vengeful. "I don't believe in vengeance, an eye for an eye, an arm for an arm," he mused, paraphrasing a biblical injunction.

Sachs, who severed his ties with the ANC in 1994 when he was appointed to the Constitutional Court for a 12-year term, explained that the triumph of democracy, or "soft vengeance," is sufficient solace for him.

Although Sachs knows the identity of at least one of the agents who planned the Maputo terrorist operation – his tormentor, like many key officials of the ancien regime, applied to South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission for amnesty – he has no particular desire to see him locked up.

"I'd be happy if they acknowledge what they did," he said, referring to the operatives who perpetrated the bombing. "They have been humbled and repudiated by history, and I feel the triumph of what we stood for. It's not like a personal thing. It's justice versus injustice, racism versus equality.

"Magnanimity, not forgiveness, is a very powerful force. You're in charge of the moral plain. Sending someone to jail won't make my arm grow back. Living in a free country is like roses and lilies growing out of my arm."

Born in Johannesburg, the son of a trade unionist and a teacher philosophically opposed to apartheid, Sachs and his brother, Johnny, a doctor, were influenced by their parents. "I took in their values, not so much the direct political content, but the sense that you could do something about the world and didn't just have to conform to it."

In his second year at the University of Cape Town, where he obtained a BA and a law degree, Sachs fell in with a crowd of politically active students in the Modern Youth Society who could not abide apartheid. "I felt there was something more than a Saturday night date," said Sachs, divorced and the father of two grown children who live in Britain.

Sachs and his fellow revolutionaries were not interested in reforming apartheid, but in dismantling it. "It was like slavery. You couldn't have a little of it. Apartheid was intrinsically ugly and cruel."

As a lawyer accredited to the Cape Town bar, he concentrated on human rights cases, a niche that got him into trouble with the government. In 1963 and again in 1966, he was detained in solitary confinement, without trial, for a total of 168 days. "It was a time of great political stress and [the authorities] were picking up ANC people."

His worst moments in prison were when he was subjected to sleep deprivation. "It affected me more than the bombing, and left long-term damage: a certain sadness and loss of self-confidence. The attack on the mind and soul is more devastating than the attack on the body."

Albie Sachs

During his imprisonment, he secretly wrote The Jail Diary of Albie Sachs, which has been dramatized by the Royal Shakespeare Company, broadcast by the British Broadcasting Corporation and staged in Canada.

He went into exile in 1966, not returning until 1990, when Mandela was released from prison. "My law practice was in ruins and I was about to be disbarred for political reasons. I could either go underground or leave. Since I wasn't strong enough to go underground, I emigrated."

During this interregnum, Sachs finished a PhD at the University of Sussex and taught law at the University of Southampton. In 1977, he took up a position as a professor at Eduardo Mondlane University in Maputo.

After the bombing and his recovery, he was a professor at Columbia University in New York City. Returning to Britain, he became the founding director of the South African Constitution Studies Centre at the University of London.

He never doubted that apartheid was doomed, but underestimated its staying power. "Our ideas were right. We were the majority in the country. The world supported us. It was a kind of moral certainty."

Upon his return, Sachs taught at the University of Cape Town, his alma mater, and participated in the deliberations that gave rise to the Constitutional Court and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which operates on the principle of confession, amnesty and forgiveness.

When he was asked whether Jewish institutions and organizations had contributed meaningfully to the anti-apartheid cause, he smiled. "They could have done more, lots more. They could have denounced racism as an official policy.

"I'm not singling out Jews from the rest of the white community for special blame. But should Jews have been more sensitive to racism because of our history? If the answer is yes, the Jewish leadership failed miserably."

In fact, although Jews did not possess a homogeneous attitude toward apartheid, there was always a strong liberal undercurrent in the Jewish community, he added. Indeed, a disproportionate number of Jews, from Joe Slovo to Ronny Kasrils, took part in the anti-apartheid struggle. Sachs thinks that the majority of Jews will remain in South Africa, its current social and economic problems notwithstanding.

He is acutely aware that Israel and South Africa, perceived as pariah states, maintained invariably excellent relations during the apartheid era. "What angered people was the nuclear co-operation, the violation of the arms embargo and the training of security personnel." It's possible, he speculated, that the South African team that tried to kill him may have received Israeli commando training.

"What's more important today is whether Middle East leaders can follow South Africa's example. We looked into each other's eyes and acknowledged our mutual insecurity and pain. We learned to keep our eyes on the main goal and not be thrown off course by disasters.

"We achieved the impossible and did it in a principled way so that everyone – whites and non-whites – benefited. It did not mean victory or defeat for either side. All people are capable of doing this."

South Africa, though still not a paragon of racial amity, has evolved into a model state where conflict resolution is achieved through dialogue, he observed. "Compared to 10 years ago, race relations are spectacularly good today."

Jewish Life

A silence that deafens

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the Torah portion this week, we read of a very disturbing incident that befalls Jacob and Leah's daughter Dinah. Upon returning to the land of Canaan, Dinah ventures out to meet young women in the land. We are then told that she is kidnapped, held captive, raped and abused by a man named Shechem.

While continuing to hold Dinah hostage, Shechem decides he wishes to marry her and asks his father to arrange the union. The father, along with Shechem, approach Jacob to work out an arrangement under which the clans can marry each other and unite. Dinah is still held captive in her abuser's home.

Jacob is unable to respond, but his sons return from the field and are apprised of the situation. Two of the brothers, Simon and Levi, decide to take matters into their own hands and bring their sister home. The text informs us that the brothers present what appears to be an honest proposal but is intended as a deceit.

Simon and Levi tell Shechem and his father that in theory the two clans can unite, but unfortunately Shechem is not circumcised and therefore they find his genitals to be disgusting. If only he and all the men in his city were to circumcise themselves, then the two clans could unite in marriage. They have effectively insulted that part of Shechem that was the weapon used against their sister.

Shechem, his father and all the men of the city agree to the terms, and the entire male foreign population is circumcised on the same day. Simon and Levi wait until the third day to take action, since the text informs us that on that day, the pain of the circumcision has peaked. While the men are incapacitated, Simon and Levi enter the city with their swords, slay all the men, free their sister Dinah and bring her home safely.

Jacob, their father, is greatly distressed upon hearing what they have done, and the controversy over the means of Dinah's rescue continues into midrashic literature and biblical commentary.

However, there is another point of importance that plays out far more subtly than the violence of the men's reaction, and that is the textual silence of Dinah.

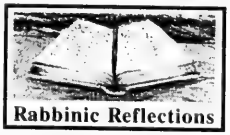
Throughout the episode, there is not one word ascribed to Dinah. She is silent during the incident and afterward. We do not hear her voice or her cries or her prayers but only her silence. Feminist writers have held this passage as a model of the textual insignificance of women, since Dinah's voice appears unimportant. Yet messages are often spoken through silence.

Dinah is the victim of rape and we know that rape is not about sex, it is about power. The abuser is guilty of more than a sexual crime, he is guilty of robbing his victim of her right to a choice – he has stolen her voice from her. Dinah is silent in the story, not because the text has silenced her, but because Shechem has silenced her.

The Torah does not want you to ignore Dinah's silence but to understand its message. The Zohar tells us that when Israel went into exile, the letters of the Divine Name were separated and God's Voice was silenced. Silence is not insignificant – it is paramount.

In good and hard times

By RABBI NEAL LOEVINGER



This week's Torah portion, Vayetze, begins with our ancestor Yaakov on the run, and like many other figures in the Bible, his solitude in the wilderness allows for an encounter with the Divine.

He dreams of the famous ladder to heaven, and receives God's assurance of protection and blessing. After he awakes and realizes the true nature of what just happened, he makes a strange kind of declaration: "Then Yaakov took a vow, saying: If God is with me, and guards me on this journey I'm taking, and will give me bread to eat and clothes to wear, and return me to my father's house in peace – HaShem will be God to me…" (Genesis 28:20-22).

Many of the classic Torah commentators struggle and stretch to deal with a fundamental problem in Yaakov's vow: its apparent conditionality. Yaakov seems to be saying: if God will give me protection and food and clothing, only then I will be loyal to God.

It's no wonder that some commentators had a hard time with this: could one of our greatest religious heroes really be so fickle as to condition his spiritual commitment on bread and clothing? What kind of loyalty is that, especially after such a powerful vision, in which he received the Heavenly promise of great blessings?

Faced with this problem, many of the commentators read Yaakov's statement not as a conditional vow, but as a prayer, something like: "Let God be with me, and protect me, and give me food to eat and clothing to wear."

The 19th century commentator known as the Netziv explains the next part of Yaakov's declaration: "and HaShem will be God to me" as one thought with "return me to my father's house." The Netziv reads all three phrases as one prayer: that God should give him protection, food, clothing, and return him to his father's house in peace.

For the Netziv, Yaakov's prayer to be returned home is central because it is in the Land of Israel, which was understood as a place of protection and heightened spirituality.

However, reading the whole thing as one prayer doesn't explain the phrase: "and Hashem will be God to me."

To solve this part of the puzzle, the Netziv explains that this phrase is not conditional, but in fact a great declaration of faith: Yaakov could be saying that even in the Land of Israel, where Divine blessings and protection are thought to be more easily perceived, he will not rely on physical strength alone, but will remember to have faith in the Divine.

This is a fascinating interpretation, suggesting that Yaakov knew that receiving a great blessing is its own kind of test of faith. Yaakov may have wanted more than anything to get back to the Promised Land, but the midrash suggests he knew that the real challenge wasn't getting there, it was doing the work of fulfilling his potential there.

It's the same for us: we might hope and pray for a relationship, a new job, children, a happy home, and many other wonderful things, but the hard part is realizing what you've been blessed with.

It's not easy to commit to continued growth, gratitude, and the hard work of sustained relationships, whether with God or another person.

We make all kinds of prayers and promises to God in hard times; the trick is to remember to "let the Holy One be a God to you" when you've reached the place you've been yearning to be.

Jewish Life

Jewish Canadian? Canadian Jew?

By SAM MEDNICK

The question of whether I am a Jewish Canadian or a Canadian Jew has never played an important role in my life before, for I know who I am and what my Judaism means to me. Or so I thought.

As Israel faces hard times in the Middle East, I have begun to reflect on where I stand with my religion.

Several of my friends decided that after graduating from high school, they would spend their first year of university at a yeshiva in Jerusalem. Had they known that a situation like the current violent one would arise in Israel, perhaps they would have thought twice. When the fighting broke out, my first thoughts were for my friends. I was concerned about their safety, as anyone would be.

"Will they return to Canada?" I asked myself. Why wouldn't they? Why would they possibly choose to stay in a battle zone, when they have security, safety, stability and their family back home?

But I soon realized it's not that easy. I began to wonder what I would do in their situation. What would I do if I was there? I started questioning my beliefs, my faith and myself. Suddenly that seemingly unimportant question of whether I was primarily Jewish or Canadian made a difference.

Two summers ago, I went to Israel with the Young Judaea Youth Movement. I had the time of my life, and I remember telling one of the Israelis I met there that I was planning to move to Israel for a year in the near future.

He asked me: "Why don't you move here to live? Why don't you make aliyah?"

I said that it was a possibility, but I wasn't sure where I wanted to spend the rest of my life, since I was only 17.

I'll never forget the look he gave and what he said. "All you Diaspora Jews are the same. You claim Israel is your homeland. You'll come and live here [for a year] and take all you can from the aretz, but will you go to the army? No. You come when times are good, but who's left here when times are bad?"

I was confused and distraught. Israel's safety wasn't my problem. Even so, it's not as if Diaspora Jews don't do our share. What about the UJA, Israel Bonds and the hundreds of other organizations whose sole purpose is to serve Israel? It would not be rational for me to pick up and go to Israel; it's not my home. I have a family back home. It was never my intention to "use" Israel and then abandon it in its time of need.

Now two years later when Israel is in serious trouble, I look back at what that man said and I feel an inner turmoil. He had a point.

I'd like to believe that if I was in Israel, studying, living there or just visiting, I would remain, simply to show my support for a country that has always supported me.

As the rabbi said recently in the synagogue: "We need Israel just as Israel needs us."

In my mind, I am a Jewish Canadian, not a Canadian Jew. I am first and foremost connected to my religion and to Israel. A country I can go to when times are good, I'd like to think, is a country that would hold me there when times are tough.

Programs help Jewish deaf

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, I began to look at some of the many resources available on the Internet for Jewish people who are deaf. Today, I continue by focusing on some of the programs being run to help deaf and hard of hearing Jews maintain links to their faith and to the rest of the Jewish community.

According to the Orthodox Union site, 90 percent of deaf people marry other deaf people. With approximately 10,000 Jewish deaf in the world, the OU has set up the Jewish Deaf Singles Registry (JDSR).

"While intermarriage is prevalent throughout the entire Jewish community, deaf Jews – a 'minority within a minority' – often intermarry out of desperation rather than indifference." [http://www.ou.org/oupr/ourwaymatchmaking.htm]

The JDSR is run by Samuel Landau, a deaf Jew who, together with his wife Rachelle (also deaf), spends about 15 hours each week sorting through letters, counselling deaf singles and helping deaf Jews find Jewish mates [http://www.jdsr.org/]. Landau says deafness is one of the most isolating handicaps.

"Because deaf people tend to have their own culture – replete with their own social clubs, athletic leagues… and of course language, many people are plagued by a hazy Jewish identity and a strong deaf identity. The Jewish deaf person is constantly confronted with the question, 'Am I Jewish or deaf first?' Many choose the latter."

The Orthodox Union also runs the Our Way program which offers several services for the Jewish deaf and hearing impaired [http://www.ou.org/ncsy/ourway/]. The Web site also lists upcoming events such as a pizza night in Philadelphia, a pre-Chanukah celebration for children ages four to 12 in New York and a family Shabbaton in Phoenix.

Camp Ramah, in the Pocono Mountains in Pennsylvania, runs another wonderful program for the deaf, called Kesher [http://www.jtsa.edu/ramah/poconos/kesher.html]. Kesher is a five-day experience for Jewish families with deaf or hard of hearing members. It was designed to enable Jewish deaf children and adults to develop a Jewish identity within a family camp program. But those five days aren't an eye-opener only for the families. One of the 14-year-olds who acted as a host during Ramah's Kesher program said, "Being involved with Kesher taught me how to communicate with people who aren't like me. You have to look deep inside of a person to find out who they are."

Being deaf should not be an obstacle to participation in Jewish learning. But according to Rabbi Avrohom Nisan Perl, director of Agudas Yisroel's Torah Projects Department, "For deaf Jews, the wealth of classes and Torah-study opportunities is a largely untapped resource." Agudas Yisroel's Flatbush congregation was offering Saturday night classes in Navi (Prophets) which were signed for the deaf. Now 20 of those classes are being offered on videotape [http://www.yated.com/videaf.htm].

Bene Shalom is a reform congregation in Skokie, Ill., that has a membership of 200 families [http://www.deaf-universe.com/Bene_Shalom/]. In 1992, the affiliated Hebrew Seminary of the Deaf was established. The seminary's five-year program includes all of the standard curriculum and courses of study required for rabbinical ordination. In addition, all students must become proficient in American Sign Language as well as Hebrew Sign Language. These skills will enable them, as rabbis and teachers, to communicate with the Jewish deaf in communities that they will eventually serve [http://www.yellowstar.com/HSD/].

But what can other congregations do to make themselves more accessible to the entire community? Our Way has several suggestions for creating a synagogue that is blind/deaf friendly [http://www.ou.org/ncsy/ourway/friendly.htm].

Make sure to:

• Provide interpreters for services, rabbis' speeches and synagogue and community events.

• Designate specific seats for the deaf to make it easier for them to either see the interpreter or read the lips of the baal koreh and baal tfillah (those who read the Torah and lead the prayer services).

• Help the disabled overcome isolation. Encourage congregants to interact with deaf/blind or hearing or visually impaired worshippers. If you do not know sign language and the deaf individual does not lip read, you can simply smile.

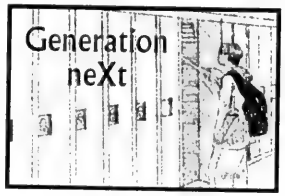
Am Yisrael Chai



We are small, but we are many
We are young but we unite,
To the candle of continuity
You are the flame, and we're the light.

By GILA ASHTOR

My mother always says that everything worth understanding is difficult to understand. From a simple quadratic equation to the metaphysics of ethical behaviour, nothing that comes easily is easily welcomed.

If anyone is a testament to the paradox of comprehension, the Jew in North America not only exemplifies my mother's message, but he practises it – every moment of every day.

In our comfortable houses, warm cars, and friendly congregations, what does Israel mean to us? In our Jewish day schools, Jewish youth groups, camps and organizations, what does Israel represent? What does it symbolize?

Some say the land is holy. Some say the air is biblical. Some consider it the quintessential bar mitzvah experience. Some prefer a summer trip. Some dream of making aliyah. Some dream of Eilat.

And, whether it is all of these things, or none of them – to everyone and everyone, Israel is home.

After 2,000 years of exile, excommunication, and violent manifestations of anti-Semitism, we are a nation that needs refuge; a nation that seeks comfort; a people that need a place to live, to love, to cherish.

We have wandered the world for so many generations, without an identity, a unity and an anthem. Being able to reach El Al and order as many tickets as we want – just to bathe in the Dead Sea, tan in Tel Aviv, and cry at the Kotel – is both a miracle and a gift. Israel is not just another country in the Middle East. Israel is not just another political crisis. And Israel is not just another Jewish place. Israel is a place for Jews. From anywhere and everywhere.

Like most of the world, I don't know what Israel needs right now. But as a youth member of Toronto's Jewish community, I think I know what we need; and that is, support, solidarity and hope.

We need to think of Israel as we think of our own safety because, in more ways than one, they are connected if not dependent on each other. We need to cherish Israeli life as we cherish our own lives because without Israel we risk forfeiting our culture and traditions forever.

But above all else, we need to never stop loving Israel as we love ourselves, praying for it in our minds and in our hearts as we pray for our own successes, dreams and destinations.

I am here today, like my peers and fellow community members, only because the dream of Israel has persevered through every pogrom, attack and revolution. Because my parents and your parents refused to stop the stories, the songs and the promises of our own country, regardless of the circumstances, threats, and dangers they were in.

Israel has been engraved into the tablet of our souls and as the children of a new era we will discover that Israel is not only the land of our forefathers, but that it is also the land for our children.

We will continue, as my mother suggested, to search within ourselves, for what Israel means to us – only to discover that Israel is us. A part of us. Not easily understood. But like most good things, forever worth understanding.

Lillian Gollom known for volunteer work at Mount Sinai

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lillian Gollom, a volunteer at the old Mount Sinai Hospital on Yorkville Avenue, died recently at age 97, on the same date as her late husband, Nathan died, 19 years ago.

Obituary

A member of The Sinais, the volunteers at the old hospital, she carried patients up and down stairs.

When the new hospital was built on University Avenue, she was active in the Sinais Service group, which raised money for cancer research.

She was well known in her later years as a tour guide at Baycrest Terrace where Israeli diplomats and community officials were participants in her groups.

A resident of Baycrest Terrace since 1990, Gollom was assistant to the late Dr. Joseph Gollom, ear, nose and throat specialist, and met many celebrities who were treated by him.

Surviving are a son, Mervin, a retired pharmacist, a daughter, Kaylee Miller, wife of Dr. Marvin Miller, six grandchildren and nine great-grandchildren.

"THERE IS NO ALTERNATIVE TO DESTROYING ISRAEL"

The above is a banner on the title page of "Our Country Palestine" Volume 1, a book introduced by the Palestinian Authority into the 6th grade curriculum for the school year 2000-2001

Why is the world surprised when "peace talks" fail? For years, Palestinians have been poisoned with calls to destroy Israel. It's in their children's books, their history books, their TV shows, their songs, their school curriculums, their sermons, their media, all fully endorsed by the Palestinian Authority.

The Palestinians swear to themselves that they won't settle for just the settlements, but intend to go all the way to Haifa and Tel Aviv. Why do we patronize them by not believing that they're serious? And how would dismantling settlements, for example, make a difference when "there's no alternative to destroying Israel"?

We challenge the United Nations to set up an International Commission to investigate the racial and genocidal teachings in Palestinian schools. We challenge the US and Israel to stop the process of unilateral concessions, with the understanding that when one side wants to destroy the other, concessions backfire and only lead to more violence.

It's time we progress from OSLO to GO-SLOW. Future talks must focus on the root of the problem: How will Palestinians reverse — institution by institution — their calls to destroy Israel, and how will we verify their compliance? Realistically, how can we expect Palestinians to make peace with Israel until they first make peace with the very idea of Israel?

For seven years, Israel turned a blind eye for the sake of peace. It didn't work. Jews For Truth Now is a reality check: We pray for peace, but we won't ignore the truth. For Israel, there is no alternative.

Teens raising funds to help abused children

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL, Ont. — SACA may not be a familiar acronym now, but if three determined 13-year-olds continue in the direction they're headed, the Save Abused Children Association (SACA) will become much more widely known in the future.

In the past month, Zack Teperman, George Paschos and Brian Gordon – all Grade 8 students at Charlton Public School – have created a logo, established a Web site (www.sacagroup.com), contacted media, organized meetings (they have more than half a dozen schoolmates working with them), collected clothing and toys for the Yellow Brick House (a local shelter) and planned a fundraising raffle.

The event will be held in conjunction with a Dec. 20 Chanukah party for students at the Westmount International Language Program, a Hebrew language program run by the York Region Board of Education, at which Brian's mother teaches.

"We want [abused] kids to have happy holidays," said Zack.

"Whether Chanukah or Christmas," added Brian.

"Or Diwali," noted George.

The group was limited in its ability to schedule programs at Charlton because its teachers have been working to rule. They hope to expand the program to other schools eventually.

As of last week, the trio had collected about 20 prizes from merchants at the Promenade shopping mall, as well as a few Diceman games from Zack's father Stuart, who created the new board game and is donating a portion of his sales to the Children's Breakfast Club.

Also included among the raffle prizes are gift certificates, baseball hats, a children's calculator, a wallet and a Sony Playstation game.

The boys approached potential donors with a letter signed by the language program administrator, attesting to the legitimacy of the fundraiser. They even received free photocopying to print informational flyers.

Longtime friends Zack and George had been involved in school projects affiliated with Free the Children, the organization established by young child rights activist Craig Kielburger. They came up with the idea of establishing their own organization while discussing a class project.

Brian, who only transferred to the school this year, was quick to become involved when he heard of his friends' idea.

Tickets are $2, or three for $5. Money raised will be given to the Yellow Brick House, but the boys haven't set a target amount.

They want to raise "as much as we can," said George. "We want the kids being abused to know that people are standing up for them."

SACA's logo, designed by Brian, is a clenched fist bursting through a jagged-edged yellow "explosion."

SACA team of Zack Teperman, Brian Gordon and George Paschos display raffle prizes. [Frances Kraft photo]

"We wanted the fist because we're fighting against [the abuse of] children," said Brian. "We just wanted to try to make a contribution, so we know we helped others."

"And we're going to continue this for years to come," added Zack.

"I give these kids credit," said Zack's mother, Wendy, who also noted that the boys are very good students. "They're our leaders for tomorrow. It's nice to see."
